This book has been twenty years in the making. It began its life as a PhD thesis at UCL which was submitted after a fair degree of filing and torturing in 2006. That project was brilliantly supervised throughout by Rhiannon Ash, in its early stages by Gerard O’Daly, and latterly by Matthew Robinson, before being examined by Bruce Gibson and Alessandro Schiesaro. Thoughts, ideas and text from that PhD project are visible throughout this project, but chapter 2 on Statius’ tyrants is in particular very closely derived from what I wrote then. All involved in my thesis deserve my heartfelt thanks for improving it and me, but I am especially grateful to Rhiannon and Bruce, who have been such valuable supporters and sources of advice over the years.

Inevitably, my thoughts on Statius have evolved in the time that has since passed. I have been fortunate to be invited to speak at a number of seminars and conferences over the years and I am very grateful to all who have helped to shape my better ideas and gently persuaded me to abandon some of the worse ones. In particular, I should give thanks to Helen Lovatt for her invitation to speak on Dante at a conference on ‘The Influence and Impact of post-Augustan Epic’ way back in July 2010, which finally metamorphosed into the final chapter of this book. Thanks are also due to Mariusz Zagorski for allowing me to present a nascent version of the first part of chapter 1 at a conference on ‘Flavian Epic and the World of Ideas’ in Warsaw in May 2012.

In a broader sense, I am grateful to have picked a research area that has such a tightly-knit and supportive community. It seems churlish to select any individuals and ignore others, but I should take this opportunity to thank Antony Augoustakis and Gesine Manuwald for so many small and frequent acts of academic kindness over the years. Putting together this book has been especially challenging in the year of coronavirus, and I am incredibly grateful to Marco Acquafredda, Kerstin Haensch, Katerina Zianna and all at de Gruyter for their calm professionalism and often remarkably rapid work on this book in such difficult times. Thanks too are owed to de Gruyter’s anonymous referees, all of whom have made this book better in all sorts of ways. The flaws of course remain my own.

As one who works at an institution without a large research library, finalising footnotes and bibliography during regular lockdowns has been tricky at times (alert readers will note my infidelity in the matter of dictionaries, for example; it often came down to whichever one I happened to be locked down with) and I would like to thank Helen Lovatt, who helped me to navigate online bibliography, Federica Bessone, who was kind enough to email me some of her own work, Victoria Yorke-Edwards, for her indefatigable assistance with online resources when she had better things to be doing, and especially to the marvelously efficient and helpful Paul Fletcher and his team in the Wodehouse Library at Dulwich College.

Publius Papinius Statius, himself both insider and outsider, seems, as this extraordinary year come to its close, more personally relevant than ever to one who teaches Classics in a British public school, that embodiment of so many white male privileges, but who is also the son of a European, and born in another country. It is great to know that this book will form some small part of my identity at least. I conclude with personal thanks to my parents, Anthony and Claudette, whose support over the years has been incalculable, and to my own family, Victoria and Nathaniel, for knowing precisely when to leave me alone and when to distract me!
