Contents

Foreword By Paul Ricoeur ............................................ ix

Preface ........................................................................... xiii

Chapter I: The Present Theological Situation and the Need for a New Theological Anthropology ................................. 1
Our Orientation and Point of Departure from Rudolf Bultmann .... 1
Some Related, Representative Voices ............................. 11
Thesis and Approach: "Conscience" as an Experiential Locus for the Understanding of "God"—a Contribution to a Theological Prolegomenon ...................................................... 23

Chapter II: The Centrality and Significance of Conscience in Ebeling’s Thought ..................................... 39
Roots of Ebeling’s Conception of Conscience in the Work of the Early Heidegger (Being and Time) ........ 48
Historical Backdrop—The "University Milieu": Marburg .......... 50
The "University Milieu": Zürich and Elsewhere .................. 53

Chapter III: Heidegger’s Phenomenological
Description of Conscience in Being and Time ................. 65

Chapter IV: Ebeling’s Interpretation of the Phenomenon of Conscience ..................................... 81

Chapter V: Man as Conscience and the Reality of "God" ........ 111

Bibliography .................................................................. 143

Index ............................................................................. 153
Subjects ......................................................................... 153
Authors/Proper Names .................................................. 160
Biblical References ........................................................ 162