To acknowledge all those on whom this study depends is impossible. But I nonetheless want to register my gratitude to those who have most decisively influenced me.

Prominent in my own mind are the persons whose lives I have shared most intimately: first, my parents, who have encouraged me in all but a few of my interests and projects; and second, my wife Nancy and our daughters Kathy and Stephanie, with whom I continue to pursue changing interests and to undertake new projects. To Nancy especially I am grateful. She has not typed this manuscript. Nor has she refined my prose and corrected my spelling. She has instead contributed much more significantly in shaping all of our life together.

Though no detailed acknowledgment is even imaginable, I also owe a great debt to the tradition on which this study focuses. Perhaps a handful of figures whose influence on me is especially strong may represent this tradition: the writers of the New Testament, Calvin, Hegel, Ernst Troeltsch, H. Richard Niebuhr.

To institutions for their collective kindness and generosity, I too want to express my gratitude: to Princeton University for allowing me to receive full credit for a virtually unrestricted year studying literature and philosophy in Germany as an undergraduate; to the Danforth Foundation for its liberal support during my graduate studies; to Yale Divinity School for permitting me the luxury of a lover's quarrel with an able opponent; to Harvard's Divinity School, its Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, and its Center for the Study of World Religions, for providing me an intellectual and spiritual home that extended from Cambridge to Ceylon and back; to Johnston College in the University of Redlands for an informal yet provocative academic setting and congenial student and faculty colleagues; and finally to the University of Redlands as a whole together with the Ford Foundation for the faculty research grant during which final revisions and manuscript preparation of this study were completed.
Collective kindness and generosity are of course mediated through individuals. In my experience with institutions of higher education, those individuals have most frequently been my teachers and colleagues. As benevolent agents of the institutions they represent, as intellectual catalysts and models, as advisors and friends, my teachers and colleagues have in their various ways shaped my approach to issues like those examined in this study. So I want to thank those whose influence has been most decisive: E. D. H. Johnson at Princeton; David H. Kelsey and George A. Lindbeck at Yale; Daniel Day Williams of Union Theological Seminary in New York who taught at Yale in spring 1966; James S. N. Preus, formerly at Harvard and now at Indiana University; Wayne L. Proudfoot, formerly at Harvard and now at Columbia University; Herbert W. Richardson, formerly at Harvard and now at St. Michael's College in the University of Toronto; Nyanaponika Thera at the Forest Hermitage in Kandy, Ceylon; and especially Gordon D. Kaufman and Richard R. Niebuhr at Harvard and Wilfred Cantwell Smith, formerly at Harvard and now at Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia.

I would also like to express my appreciation to Dr. Jacques D. J. Waardenburg, the general editor of the Mouton ‘Religion and Reason’ series, for his precise and helpful editorial suggestions.

For their skill and graciousness in typing and retyping the manuscript of this study, I want to thank Grace Friend Mullen of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Doris M. Stockman and Angela C. Sanabia of Redlands, California.
