A conjunction of circumstances led to the making of this book. I owe thanks to my doctoral supervisor, the late Professor Ryszard Przybylski. Many years ago, at the beginning of the 1980s, he envisioned that I would be a literary historian and planned the first steps of my path, that is, my adventure with Enlightenment literature in the form of a doctorate.

The idea for a new synthesis emerged from the Directorate of the Institute of Literary Research (IBL) with which I have been associated since 1983. It was not a proposal suggested directly to me; a competition was announced, but I was its only entrant. The original brief was not quite reflected in the vision of the book, but there was no choice. Despite the awareness of how difficult and responsible a task it would be, I felt that I could make use of my earlier experience: writing numerous encyclopedia and handbook entries as well as a school textbook and two compendia of 20th-century Polish literature (1914–1944 and 1975–1988), which continue to be in print for the use of students.

The writing of this book would not have been possible without considerable experience in the realm of international cooperation. For many years, I worked with the Deutsches-Polen Institut in Darmstadt, thanks to which I was able to reflect on many matters and am grateful to my German translators for the reassurance that what I write is indeed translatable. Further visits to France, participation in the work of the Association Internationale des Critiques Littéraires (later the Association Internationale de la Critiques Littéraires) demonstrated to me the difficulties of communicating certain Polish literary questions abroad; I also gained a great deal from participating in international conferences in Greece on the island of Lesbos, organized by Costas Valetas. Subsequent short grants from the British Academy led to further, private visits to London, during which I became aware of the range of various literary traditions and observed different styles of pursuing the humanities. The latter enabled me not only to learn, but equally to unlearn a great deal, in order to discard, with a clear conscience, tendencies typical in Polish literature of excessive over-technicality in literary reflection. Visits to Kyiv, Moscow and to Lithuania several times were invaluable, the last of which I owe to Rasa Rimickaitė and Herkus Kunčius. This was of enormous help to me in understanding the difficult issues of the region. Also fruitful were further trips as part of the international PEN club, including stays in Japan, Korea and Columbia which permitted a long-range view of Polishness.

Especial thanks are due to my editorial colleagues at the bimonthly Teksty Drugie for their conversations in the course of the writing of this book, which fortified and sustained a belief in the history of Polish literature as a subject of interest and in the need to reevaluate its portrayal.

I thank my family, too, for their understanding and patience throughout my intensive labours.
