Aim and Scope

The Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law is dedicated to the advancement of legal knowledge in the field of International Constitutional Law. By linking various perspectives the Journal endorses an approach towards a coherent understanding of International Constitutional Law and preparing the ground for novel answers to the challenges of a changing global legal framework. Connecting different systems of Constitutional Law on a national and international level allows to explore the tension and the congruence, both within and between constitutional networks, and to further discuss and develop appropriate solutions.

The Journal aims to provide a forum for critical discussion on topics of International Constitutional Law focusing on recent developments in National Constitutional Orders and in Public International Law as well as on questions in the field of Legal Theory. Advised by a body of international referees the Journal features high-standard contributions by scholars and legal professionals from around the globe. Furthermore, the Journal monitors constitutional developments in CEE, particularly by assessing select case law of National High Courts.

The Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law addresses the global scientific community, scholars and researchers in various disciplines working in the field of International Constitutional Law. Moreover, the Journal provides information on comparative constitutional developments, relevant to practitioners as well as academics.
