

Acknowledgments

I have tried my thoughts out on many people, notably my husband, Neal, who as always has been very patient and very helpful, and my students, to whom I must render thanks and, no doubt, apologies. My particular gratitude goes to Professor Richard Ashcraft of the Department of Political Science, University of California, Los Angeles, whose advice has been invaluable and many of whose insights, particularly in relation to John Locke, I have quite shamelessly appropriated. Finally, I cannot omit giving thanks to the typing pool at York University, Toronto, and to Mrs. Ruth Griffin, of Glendon College, who performed miracles in helping me to meet various and sundry deadlines.
