When Fortunatus set out to describe the life and miracles of St. Hilary, he was properly daunted by the task: it was, he wrote, like trying "to put one's finger on heaven." All historians know the feeling well, and they also know that their attempts to take the past into their own hands are greatly dependent upon the support and encouragement of others.

While researching and writing this book I have had the rare privilege of being associated with several outstanding academic institutions. I am especially grateful to King's College and Churchill College in the University of Cambridge, Stanford University, Dumbarton Oaks Center for Byzantine Studies, and now the University of Texas at Austin for financial support, library resources, and the time to work.

But I owe the most to friends: to Dick Whittaker, who supervised the dissertation that became parts of the first chapters of this book; to Peter Brown, who inspired my interest in Late Antiquity through his writings and now continues to encourage and enlighten me; to Dave Braund, Peter Garnsey, Richard Gordon, John Heath, Kent Kelley, Geoffrey Lloyd, Brent Shaw, and Ian Wood, for advice and criticism over the years; to Jody Maxmin and Aaron, for midnight phone calls; and to Doris Kretschmer, for assistance at the Press. A mere listing of names does not do justice to all they have taught me; and a simple acknowledgment of my gratitude can only hint at additional personal memories of intellectual inspiration and quiet laughter.
