Acknowledgments

This book has reminded me of two truths about authorship: that writing is a joyful but isolating business and that at the same time every book is a collaborative effort. I owe much to many who contributed new perspectives, advice, patience, love, and much listening time as this book took shape.

I first want to thank Patricia Troxel for our long conversations about American fiction and culture in which the idea for this book was born and began to take shape. Many others participated along the way with good ideas, helpful criticism, and an occasional admonishment to get on with it. Among those I wish especially to thank are Kathryn Reiss and Tom Strychacz, David Troxel, Vicki Reback, Bill Howarth, Karl Zender, Kevin Clark, Laura Jason, Kearnon Kanne, and the students in my course on architecture and fiction. The backdrop to all those conversations was my own valuable experience of what home, housekeeping, and homemaking meant, gathered in the years I spent with my reflective and articulate parents, Mary and Le-Gare Chandler.

I am grateful to the National Endowment for the Humanities for a summer grant that gave me time and means to take a closer look at historic houses in New England as well as a long second look at my manuscript and to the Arnold Graves Foundation for funding a sabbatical leave that brought the work near completion.

Thanks also to Doris Kretschmer for her editorial assistance and to Carol Lennox and Richard Povall in the Mills College faculty computer center, who provided invaluable assistance in preparation of the manuscript.

Finally, I am most grateful to my daughters, Mary, Elizabeth, and Margaret, for the extraordinary understanding with which they saw me through every stage of this effort and all the life changes that accompanied it; and to Michael, my best critic, my teacher in much, my partner in everything, without whom "all I do at piling stone on stone . . . is roofless around nothing." To the four of them this book is dedicated with much love.
