Quality, it is said, is more important than quantity. Especially in large numbers. Over the many years it has taken me to research and write this book, I have had more than one occasion to verify this adage. The friends who accompanied me along the way were of rare generosity and invaluable assistance. But they also were numerous, for which I am particularly grateful.

Michael Gilsean, who supervised this project from its beginnings, was a constant source of inspiration and comfort. In more ways than they can know, Jean Manas and Rebecca Haile compelled me to question my beliefs, leading me to others they no doubt would challenge just as convincingly. I also am indebted to Donald Billingsley, Immanuel Wallerstein, David Apter, Ursula Werner, Richard Ward, and Augusta Conchiglia, who read the manuscript in one version or other and offered helpful advice.

I owe thanks to the Rhodes Trust for support I received during my years at Oxford and visits to Algeria. In Algeria, I could not have found my way—in every sense of that word—without the exceptional hospitality and guidance of Mohamed Yazid and his family. Similar gratitude goes to Mustapha and Maha Benabdellaziz and to Hocine Ait-Ahmed. I know how much they gave for their country, and I know the pain that the destruction visited upon it must cause them all.

More than once during these years, in the midst of momentary and not quite so momentary discouragement, I have been blessed with my family's presence. Nadia, Rick, and Kate were persistent in their support, generous with their patience, magnanimous with their affection.

To Caroline, who was always there, encouraging and pressing me on when I needed it most, my everlasting devotion. As for my parents, this book truly is their story. They dedicated their lives to the Third World and to their children. They never lost faith in it, nor we in them. To my parents, I wish to express my admiration, my gratitude, and my love.
