I am deeply grateful to the late Diane Cleaver, who was my literary agent during most of the research and writing of this book. She cared intensely about the issues the book raised and fought for its publication. I miss her.

I also appreciate the support and guidance of Steven Schechter, my attorney, whose enthusiasm cheered me through the final stages of this work.

I owe a huge debt to Diane Curcio Walsh, a splendid reporter for the Newark Star-Ledger. She opened many doors for me when they seemed permanently locked, and was a great friend through the seemingly endless course of this case. I also want to acknowledge the help of another colleague, Christopher Kilbourne, of The Record of New Jersey. Alan Ziegler, director of the writing program at Columbia University, was a supportive listener and a wise counselor throughout.

Harriet Barlow and Sheila Kinney welcomed me to Blue Mountain Center in the Adirondack Mountains of New York State, one of the most beautiful places in the world, where I wrote a large chunk of this book.

For more than six years, Linda Grant, Cherry Provost, Terry Webster, and Kathleen Middleton, among others in Glen Ridge, treated me with courtesy, kindness, and understanding. During that time I also mercilessly hounded the defense lawyers and prosecutors. And they responded to my never-ending questions with good humor, patience, and surprising tolerance of my legal deficiencies.

I will always be grateful to Naomi Schneider and William Murphy, my editors at the University of California Press, who rescued me from the nearly fatal embrace of Simon & Schuster, where the bottom line rules absolutely.
My wife, Becky Aikman, kept me going from beginning to end, even when it seemed that there never would be an end. Her intelligence and convictions are the soul of this book.
