ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I cannot put into words how much it has meant to me, over the course of completing this book, to share my life with Cristhian Soto-Arévalo, Joseph Choueike, and Andrew Glaspie. Like many other misfits, we use the word family to describe what we might be, even as we recognize the inadequacy of available languages to describe the sustaining, queer and crip, ways of thriving in the world that we’ve collectively shaped. As always for me, Tom Murray and Angela Hewett have also been at the center of it all, contributing to that thriving; Tom has the distinction of being part of my life and supporting me from the very first time I published an article in queer theory, in the early 1990s. I love you all and thank you for the laughter, companionship, and sheer joy with which you surround me; I thank Cristhian in particular for shaping a home with me. Thais Austin, Karen Rodríguez, and Nate Swift-Erslev are also part of the sustaining network of our life, and I am grateful to each of you. Over the course of writing this book, my collaborations with Merri Lisa Johnson, Kateřina Kolářová, and Anna Mollow have enriched my life and work; the deep friendships and queer, crip, and feminist connections I have shaped with each of you as we have presented, written, edited, or taught together have profoundly shaped the way I approach the world. You are present in so many ways in the pages of this book.

David Mitchell and Sharon Snyder’s arrival in Washington, D.C., in 2013 was transformative; I still cannot believe that they are just around the corner. I am honored to be your friend and colleague and love the fact that we have presented together on disability and political economy from Washington to Moscow to Byron Bay, Australia. I hope it is clear to readers of Crip Times how much it has been shaped in conversation with your own groundbreaking scholarship. David and Sharon have been part of a Washington, D.C.-area disability studies writing group; the emergence of that group as I was producing the final draft of this book has been a lifeline. I am so grateful to the rigorous commentary of the other members of that group over the past few years: Julia Watts Belser, Jeff Brune, Jonathan Hsy, and Sara Scalenghe.

Anna Mollow and Holly Dugan deserve special mention here, as they read the entire manuscript during the final year of revisions. I have taken so many of Anna’s suggestions in the pages ahead; I have no doubt that the clarity of the arguments in every chapter is in part due to her careful reading and thinking about the material. My only regret is that I have not been able to incorporate more of her invaluable suggestions. Holly’s enthusiasm for the project and capacity for connecting it to the things we teach and think about in George Washington University’s Department of English are much appreciated, as are the ways in which she has consistently underscored the project’s timeliness and even urgency.

I am so fortunate in general to have the most amazing group of colleagues at GWU; special thanks to Jeffrey Jerome Cohen for his support and friendship and for reading portions of Crip Times over the years. I have also received incisive commentary on particular chapters from Daniel DeWispelare, Jonathan Hsy, Ayanna Thompson, and Gayle Wald. In English and across the university, I have benefited from innumerable conversations about this work and related material and want to thank especially Marshall Alcorn, Jennifer Chang, Patricia Chu, Manuel Cuellar, Joseph Fisher, Wade Fletcher, Randi Gray Kristensen, Antonio López, Dan Moshenberg, Dara Orenstein, Lisa Page, Rachel Riedner, Tara Wallace, Gail Weiss, and Abby Wilkerson. My students continue to inspire me and I want to particularly acknowledge Gabrielle Bychowski, Tyler Christensen, Dora Danylevich, Brady Forrest, Ian Funk, D. Gilson, Peyton Joyce, Molly Lewis, and Sam Yates. Constance Kibler continues to work some sort of queer magic to keep the Department of English afloat; working with her over the past several years has kept me grounded. Connie, your friendship means so much to me.

It has been an extreme privilege to engage with and write about the work of Livia Radwanski and Liz Crow, the two artists who are at the center of the second half of Crip Times. I encountered Livia’s work and the global project “El Museo de los Desplazados” in July 2013, and made contact with Livia herself the following year. I am so grateful to her for putting me in contact in turn with a range of artists and activists thinking about culture, housing activism, and disability in Mexico City, including Mariana Delgado, Ricardo Nurko, and Javier Toscano. Ricardo gave me a long walking tour of Colonia Roma and was able to provide a great deal of insight into the shifting architecture of the neighborhood; my long discussion with Javier about housing and disability activism in Mexico City in general was indispensable. By the time I met Livia in person in October 2015, I felt like we were old friends. We walked the streets of Colonia Roma together and most importantly, went together into Calle Mérida, Number 90, where she introduced me to many of the residents who had struggled for more than five years to return to their home. Livia also connected me to the Left Hand Rotation collective, which originated El Museo de los Desplazados in Spain and Portugal, and I appreciate their enthusiasm for my work and help in understanding their global project. Liz met with me on short notice for the first time in July 2014 in Bristol; our conversation ultimately changed the shape of the project, making it clear to me that I needed to have a chapter on her 2015 performance piece Figures. During the 2015 performance, it was an honor to be part of the project for a few days as Liz sculpted alongside the banks of the Thames in London; Liz’s production team, including Matthew Fessey, China Blue Fish, and Jessie Edge were amazing and so welcoming. Livia and Liz are very different artists working in very different locations in the world, but their critical thinking on class, gender, embodiment, and social justice harmonizes in so many unexpected ways. I am grateful to both artists for reading and commenting on the chapters that focus on their work.

This book is also about crip and queer activism, and Bethany Stevens deserves special notice in that regard. I appreciate how open she was to working with me as I wrote about This Is What Disability Looks Like. I am also grateful to her for being so much fun and such a good friend.

A University Facilitating Fund grant from GWU provided much needed support for this project at a crucial moment in 2014, in particular making possible a research trip to the UK. The fact that Crip Times centers on the UK means that many colleagues and friends there have been indispensable. During my research trip in 2014, I spoke with Liz Carr, Jo Church, Kaliya Franklin, Sue Marsh, and others; as should be clear in the pages ahead, Kaliya’s beautiful photograph “Left Out in the Cold” quickly became an iconic image for me over the completion of this project. Lucy Burke deserves special mention for all that she has done over the past several years keeping me apprised on the nuances of British politics and austerity’s impact on disabled people. I am very grateful to Richard Seymour for sending me his book Against Austerity when it was still in manuscript. His work has influenced my own thinking in so many ways; I can only hope to approach the level of nuance he brings to analyses of class, austerity, and British politics. I have never met Samuel Miller in person but I found countless articles on disability, austerity, and the UK thanks to him. I was fortunate to meet Matthew McQuillan in early 2015, and am grateful to him for connecting me to a range of housing activists in London. A hearty thanks as well to other UK-based colleagues and friends who provided invaluable insights or simply moral support: Clare Barker, David Bolt, Marie Clare, Dan Goodley, Catherine Long, Stuart Murray, Simon Wales, and Philippa Willitts. My friendship and collaboration with Margrit Shildrick extends beyond our many UK-based conversations; I am particularly grateful to the ways in which she has made possible conversations about my work in Sweden and Norway.

Portions of what eventually became this book were initially presented in Spain in July 2011, in the weeks and months following the initial occupation by activists of the Puerta del Sol in Madrid, protesting the government’s austerity measures. My interactions with activists and thinkers in Spain in that summer and in subsequent visits have been life-changing. Melania Moscoso’s friendship, deep knowledge of Spanish history and disability activism, and anticapitalist politics animate every page of this book that is focused on Spain. I’m grateful as well to my friends Sara María Morón, Lucas Platero, Soledad Arnau Ripollés, Javier Romañach, and the late, sorely missed Paco Guzmán Castillo. In July 2015, Andrea García-Santesmases made it possible for me to present portions of this project for the first time in Spanish, in Barcelona. I want to thank Andrea and the amazing group of Barcelona-based disability activists, including Antonio Centeno and Raúl de la Morena.

In Mexico, Jhonatthan Maldonado Ramirez has been key in disseminating the work of crip theory in general and in providing a venue for me to discuss Crip Times; I also want to thank Elsa Muñiz García, Mauricio List Reyes, and other members of the scholarly network Cuerpo en la Red. I’m deeply grateful to Cristián Iturriaga for meeting with me in Santiago in June 2015 and for his ongoing updates on student activism and disability activism in Chile. Matthew Durington sent me his work on securitization and South Africa, which helped to shape the section of the manuscript on Oscar Pistorius. Crip Times is not directly about Brazil, but Marco Gaverio, Anahi Guedes de Mello, Michelle Lage, and Amanda Muniz have made possible conversations and presentations about the project that have helpfully linked the project to disability and antiausterity activism there, and I thank them for it.

Gina di Grazia is one of the finest readers of my work, and I was fortunate to have her as a research assistant during part of the time I was completing this book. So many colleagues have read parts of this manuscript directly or rigorously engaged with it as I have presented it publicly over the past six years. In addition to those I have already noted, I want to thank Rachel Adams, Stacy Alaimo, Susan Antebi, Claire Barber, Cynthia Barounis, Elizabeth Bearden, Liat Ben-Moshe, Pamela Block, Fiona Kumari Campbell, Peter Campbell, Mel Y. Chen, Eli Clare, Christina Crosby, Ann Cveticovich, Lennard Davis, Jay Dolmage, Lisa Duggan, Jill Ehnenn, Julie Passanante Elman, Bengt Elmén, Nirmala Erevelles, Ramzi Fawaz, Roderick Ferguson, Anne Finger, Margaret Fink, Kevin Floyd, Kelly Fritsch, Ann Fox, Rosemarie Garland-Thomson, Macarena Gomez-Barris, Kim Q. Hall, Christina Hanhardt, Cassandra Hartblay, Louise Hickman, Morgan Holmes, Michelle Jarman, Benjy Kahan, Anastasia Kayiatos, Ann Keefer, Katie King, Christopher Krentz, Riva Lehrer, Marilee Lindemann, Dana Luciano, Josh Lukin, Nina Mackert, Micki McGee, Patrick McKeelvey, Rod Michalko, Julie Avril Minich, Sophie Mitra, José Esteban Muñoz, Kevin Murphy, Mimi Thi Nguyen, Robert Dale Parker, Catherine Prendergast, Margaret Price, Alyson Patsavas, Jasbir Puar, Sangeeta Ray, Zahari Richter, Rebecca Sanchez, Carrie Sandahl, Sami Schalk, Susan Schweik, Alexis Shotwell, Martha Nell Smith, Karen Soldatic, Susan Stryker, Nikki Sullivan, Carly Thomsen, Tanya Titchkosky, Karen Tongson, Amy Vidal, Salvador Vidal-Ortiz, Jeremy Wade, Linda Ware, Margot Weiss, Melissa Autumn White, Kathi Wiedlack, and Cindy Wu. A special thanks to Margaret Price, Ann Fox, and Johnna Keller for a much-needed conversation about anxiety at a key moment of completing final revisions.

J. Jack Halberstam and an anonymous reader for NYU Press provided enthusiastic commentary that made the final version of this book so much better. Jack read the revised manuscript as well and I am very grateful for his care in doing so, his great suggestions along the way, and his friendship. As always, it is a pleasure to work with NYU Press, and with Alicia Nadkarni and Eric Zinner, in particular. Ellen Samuels and Michael Bérubé, a final thanks to you. As we inaugurate Crip: New Directions in Disability Studies, I look forward to thinking with you about the expansive and transformative ways in which disability is shaping and reshaping our world.
