Acknowledgments

I recognize that I am at this point by grace. Far too many begin the journey of writing a book only to have it remain unfinished for far too long. I am truly grateful to family, friends, and colleagues who have provided unflagging spiritual, emotional, editorial, and even financial support. Mentors near and far have shaped my work and commitment to an intellectual life with practical political applications.

My thanks go first to Robin D. G. Kelley and Gerald Horne, intellectual activists of the first order. If ever you have spoken to me, you have heard the honored names “Robin” and “Dr. Horne,” emblems of their truly divergent personalities and the shared worship I reserve for them. Jobs, conversations, books, articles and emotional support are just a few of the ways these wonderful Black men were supportive of my career. I can only aspire to be part of the same kind of support system for others as I continue my academic career.

Further, without the work and timely encouragement of Cathy Cohen, Paula Giddings, Craig Calhoun, and Lisa Disch I may have quit long ago. I also thank my earlier academic advisers: Pamela Johnston Conover, Susan Bickford, Norman Hurley, Stephanie Rowley, and Isaac Unah. In many cases I started out as their student and am fortunate to have their intellectual contributions be part of my ongoing work.

This project was supported by the James Irvine Foundation Minority Dissertation Scholar Fellowship and the Faculty Development Fund of the University of San Francisco. Colleague and mentor Pamela Balls-Organista provided much-appreciated ethnic psychology discussion, empathy, and lots of great wine in the final years of writing this book. My politics department colleagues Robert Elias and Roberta Johnson both offered extensive advice on the book proposal that ultimately turned into the pages at hand. In thinking about the politics of disgust from a theoretical perspective, I benefited greatly from conversations with David Kim and Lisa Wagner, who shared their thoughts in preparation for presentations at the Passions of the Color Line: Emotions and Race Conference at the University of San Francisco.

During my brief stint at Pennsylvania State University I worked with some outstanding women scholars who offered feedback on chapters as we shared coffee or wine twice a month. The “Tenure-Track Divas”—Holloway Sparks, Marnina Gonick, and Lisa Miller—all gave incisive feedback on various chapter drafts that improved the book immensely. As we all get our books out in the next few years, we will hopefully all become the “Tenured Divas!”

My sisters-by-choice from around the country cheered me on up close or at a distance depending on my domicile of the moment—New York, Chapel Hill, San Francisco, State College, and now New Haven. Debbie Atwater, Cynthia Boaz, Trevaughn Brown, Ariane Coleman, Robyn Spencer, Tracey Ungar, Teri Washington, and Nicole Webster would listen, cajole, empathize, lecture or simply spirit me away from it all for five days or five minutes. Todd Ellinwood, Anthony Graham, James Taylor, Josh Tower, Greg Weeks, and Steve Wuhs are also friends who remained open to talking about anything but the book!

Last, but certainly not least, I could not have finished this project without the help of some very committed and spirited assistance. Research assistants Kristen Bonatz, Danice Cook, Dana Evans, Patricia Hageny, Heather Ondecin, Elisa Bramble, and Bryant Hall were valuable “foot soldiers” in this enterprise, as were University of North Carolina library staff Marlin Murrell and Glenn Brooks. Former University of San Francisco librarian Kathy Brazee provided speedy service with a smile when my project made an unexpected turn in a different direction, and Patricia Heinecke offered her valuable editing expertise to earlier incarnations.

I thank the first Dr. Hancock—my father Charles—my mother, Theresa, and my sisters, Nicole B. Hancock and Janine H. Jones, for their love and commitment to my vision. I also thank the most recent additions to our family—my brother-in-law, Christopher Jones, and my niece, Taylor Renee Jones—for reminding me that the life of the mind is nothing without the love of family. To recognize the contributions of others in no way suggests they are responsible for whatever failings remain. Without their presence, however, whatever successes are present would not exist.
