Acknowledgments

The list of people who deserve to be acknowledged for contributing to the research, analysis, and writing that went into the book is prohibitively long. Let me thank by name three people who played a special part. Don Sabo encouraged me to continue earlier work on men in prison and develop a larger project, which became this book. Carole Shammas confronted me with difficult questions about the relationship between punishment and patriarchy, forcing me to rethink and rewrite key sections. Molly Claflin, my brilliant research assistant, worked over and reworked an early draft, identifying weaknesses and tracing trends into present-day America. Thank you.

New York University Press reviewers made superb criticisms and constructive suggestions involving gender, race, and prisoner voices. Dedicated research librarians at the University of Southern California as well as online used-book dealers helped me obtain crucial resources. Scores of students showed good grace and great insight when I compelled them to read and write about punishment, prisons, and patriarchy in my classes. I thank you too.

This book would have been completed earlier had it not been for my son’s intrusions into my work life. He had the nerve to move from the West Coast to the East Coast, marry a terrific woman, and partner with her to provide my wife, Kathy, and me with two outstanding grandchildren. I was forced to interrupt work on this book to make transcontinental trips for weddings, births, and family visits. Kathy and I would not have had it any other way. Simon, Melissa, Shane, and A.J., we love you.
