I am deeply grateful to many people who have nurtured and guided me throughout this project. My parents, Carol and Arthur Levine, offered emotional support during this book’s countless challenges. I could never sufficiently thank them for everything they have done. When thorny issues arose, I counted on Sheila Tarabour’s expertise. My cousin Louise Guy is the best listener around. And my brother, Larry—my first pal—has championed this project from the beginning.

This book never would have materialized without the support of my graduate school advisers. Carol Gilligan’s interviewing technique strongly influenced my own methods; I owe much of my project’s success to her example. Her suggestions and encouragement have profoundly enriched my work. Laurel Thatcher Ulrich’s rigorous, insightful input has led me to crucial improvements, and I deeply appreciate her encouragement as well.

Jennifer Hammer has been a superb editor: enthusiastic, thorough, patient, and always friendly. Her support and insights have been invaluable. Special thanks to Heather McMaster, Melissa Scheld, and Despina Gimbel for their hard work.

Several other people read parts of this manuscript or offered critical advice, including Elena Paolini (who helped me in countless ways as I worked on this project), Sherrie Inness, Lis Harris, Emily Levine (the book’s subtitle reflects her wise advice), Sharon Lamb, Meryl Zegarek, Susan Zeckendorf, Bill Madden, Rabbi Shmuel Posner, and Sam Brown. Sherrie deserves particular mention; she read nearly every chapter of this manuscript with a careful, discerning eye. Though they hadn’t yet read the book, my incredible students at Tufts showed genuine enthusiasm for this project.
Friends provided fabulous conversation, laughs, and moral support: Elena Paolini, Laurie Pearson, Andrew Pearson, Michael Richter, Bill Madden, Rachel Noel, Dan Noel, Linda Prince, and my wonderful Leverett House lunch buddies, Diamond Cephus, Kate Holbrook, Sam Brown, Leeanna Varga, John Matthew, Geoffrey Shamu, and Chip Robinson. And I must not forget Christine McFadden, who always knew my adventures with Hasidic girls would become a book.

Privacy concerns do not allow me to name the most crucial contributors of all—the many Lubavitch girls and community people who made this project possible. To everyone who offered me the hospitality and warmth that made my Crown Heights stay so rewarding, thank you. In particular, I must thank my Crown Heights landlords; they made Brooklyn feel like home.

Finally, I thank several remarkable family members who died while I was writing this book. My Aunt Selma and Uncle Nat Guy encouraged me to succeed since early childhood. My grandmother Miriam Levine was an inspiring role model. She was a fighter, stubborn and determined, who nearly always managed to achieve her goals. Abraham Wellen, my grandfather, was confident that I would achieve all my dreams, and I will always remember his constant encouragement, generosity, and love. And my grandmother Helen Wellen was my unwa-vering fan from the day I entered this weird world. She gave me enough love, confidence, fabulous memories, and optimism about my future to last a lifetime.
