Acknowledgments

Authors of scholarly endeavors inevitably incur many debts during the production of their work. Impossible Witnesses: Truth, Abolitionism, and Slave Testimony certainly represents no exception in this regard. I thank the staffs of the British Library in London, the Huntington Library in Pasadena, UCLA Research Library and Special Collections, the American Library in Paris, and the library at the Centre Georges Pompidou in Paris.

This book would never have been possible without the support, advice, and encouragement of many people who proved in so many ways that they believed in me. For all their help, time, understanding, kindness, and for providing me with a real intellectual community, especially during the years it took to produce the dissertation that preceded this book, I thank the following teachers, friends, and colleagues: Thomas Augst, Lindon Barrett, Juan Battle, Michael Bennett, David Blackmore, Jennifer Devere Brody, Fred Burwick, Chris Cunningham, Darrell D. Darrisaw, Georgina Dodge, Bill Handley, Phil Harper, Sharon Holland, Jonathan Holloway, Patrick Johnson, Rachel Lee, Arthur Little, Shelia Lloyd, Elizabeth McHenry, John Nieto-Phillips, Cyrus Patell, Jonathan Post, Robert Reid-Pharr, Charles Rowell, Darieck Scott, Jeffrey Shoulson, Eric J. Sundquist, Sam Weber, Michelle M. Wright, Julian Yates; the entire administrative staff of the UCLA English Department, especially Nora Elias, Rick Fagin, Jeanette Gilkison, David Rahmel, and Doris Wang; and a very special thanks to Toni Crowe and Michelle Harding. For their very special friendship and support not only of this project but of my intellectual, spiritual, and emotional well-being in all my endeavors, I thank dear friends Andrew Dechet, Ken Dorfman, Martin Dupuis, Frank Geraci, Fred Haug, Karen Lang, Olivier Lessmann, Olivier Leymarie, Jay Louser and Allen Neilsen, Bob E. Myers, and Lisa B. Thompson. In fact, so much of this book, especially in its early stages as a dissertation, was discussed, debated, and clarified with Bob Myers that it would not have been nearly as interesting or rigorous a process without his input.

Let me also thank the following institutions that have supported and sustained me during my time in graduate school: the Ford Foundation, the University of California Office of the President, the UCLA English Department, and the UCLA Graduate Division. Special thanks are due to Jennifer De Vere Brody, Mark Canuel, Jennifer Fleischner, and Jonathan Holloway for reading and commenting on the manuscript in its final draft stages before publication. Where I have taken their criticism, the book has been made better for it.

I owe a great debt of gratitude to my sister and brother-in-law, Makelia McBride-Hampton and Willie Hampton, for their love and support, which have always been unfailing. And to my parents, James and Bettye McBride, to whom this book is dedicated, my debt cannot be repaid. I also want to express my love and appreciation to Jason K. Martin for aiding and supporting me in the final preparation stages of this book. He is becoming a true partner in all things in my life.

A good part of this book was drafted while I was in residence in the Department of English at Louisiana State University as the Distinguished Dissertation Fellow and Visiting Lecturer. My debts there are also numerous. I thank the following people of the LSU community for their support, friendship, and collegiality: Lynn Berry, Gail Carrithers, the late Matthew Clark, Bainard Cowan, Jesse Gellrich, Michelle Gellrich, Michael Griffith, Rob Hale, Jerry Kennedy, Ricardo Matthews, Preselfannie McDaniels, Ladrica Menson, Elsie Michie, Rick Moreland, James Olney, Laura Sams, Keith Sandiford, Maria Smith, Maria Adams Smith, Leonard and Lisa Vraniak, and the LSU English Department staff, especially Susan Kohler, the late Claudia Scott, and Jennifer Whalen. A special thanks to the students in my senior/graduate seminar, “Abolitionist Discourse,” for eagerly and enthusiastically pushing the limits of my thinking about many of the questions involved in this book. I offer a very special thanks to Chris Kisling, Pat and Joan McGee, Jean and Kelly Rahier, and Jesse Wiseman for their freely given friendship and intellectual camaraderie, and for enduring me in the various emotional states precipitated by this work in its early stages. My productivity would not have been nearly so high were it not for Pat McGee’s generosity with his comments, conversation, and good food at his table. He made my time at LSU both rewarding and extremely meaningful. He is a model senior colleague.

I also thank the people and institutions that have sustained me in the completion of this work since graduate school: the UC Office of the President, for a year of postdoctoral study; the UCLA English Department, for hosting me, and Eric Sundquist, for being a superb mentor during that postdoctoral year; the National Endowment for the Humanities, for a summer stipend; Raymond Paredes, UCLA associate vice-chancellor for Academic Development, for providing funds for research assistance; the University of Pittsburgh Department of English, for being a wonderful institutional home and for research and travel support; the University of Pittsburgh Office of the Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, for summer stipend support, leave time, and travel and research support; Jack Daniel, vice-provost at University of Pittsburgh, for providing funds for research assistance; the Mellon Postdoctoral Research Fellowship at the Newberry Library in Chicago, for a crucial year of postdoctoral work during which I benefited from the friendship and conversation of Canon Schmitt, Pat Crain, Diana Robin, and Jim Williams; and the University of Illinois at Chicago’s former English Department head, Don Marshall, and the dean of Liberal Arts and Sciences, Stanley Fish, for a semester of leave time.

The bulk of this work was undertaken while I was on faculty at the University of Pittsburgh in the Department of English. Many thanks to all my colleagues there who provided such an intellectually fecund and collegial community in which to work. Among them I especially thank the following for their time, friendship, and support: Jonathan Arac, David Bartholomae (my department chair), Brenda Berrian, Paul Bové, Fiona Cheong, Eric Clarke, Toi Derricotte, Lynn Emmanuel, Jane Feuer, Catherine Gammon, Nancy Glazener, Ronald Judy, the late Carol Kay, Marcia Landy, Colin MacCabe, Donald Petesch, Shalani Puri, and Richard Tobias. The staff of the University of Pittsburgh’s English Department was also extraordinary and unflagging in its support. Many thanks to Sue Borello, Maria Cedeno, Peg Chalus, Gerri England, Annette Galluze, Pat Renkiewicz, Sandy Russo, and Connie Sowinski.

This book has been completed since I joined the faculty at the University of Illinois at Chicago (UIC). Even in the short time I have been there, I have friends and colleagues who have supported me and my work a great deal. Among them I thank Thomas Bestual, Nicholas Brown, Mark Canuel, Nancy Cirillo, Jamie Daniel, Lisa Freeman, Judith K. Gardiner, Robin Grey, James Hall, Thomas Hall, Patricia Harkin, Darnell Hawkins, Jamie Hovey, Clark Hulse, John Huntington, Michael Lieb, Chris Messenger, Sterling Plumpp, Barbara Ransby, Mary Beth Rose, Philip Royster, Dave Schaafsma, James Sosnoski, Joseph Tabbi, Ken Warren, Virginia Wright Wexman, and all the graduate student and faculty colleagues from Chicago-area campuses who participate in the UIC Race and Ethnicity Study Group meetings.

I am also deeply grateful to my editor at NYU Press, Eric Zinner. His support and guidance have been unfailing and always timely. To my mind, he exemplifies everything one wants in an editor.

I want also to mention the institutions and departments who have given me a forum in which to present and discuss this work.
I am grateful to the English, literature, and African American studies faculty and graduate students at the following places who shared so generously their thoughts and suggestions about this project: Oberlin College; University of California, San Diego; Loyola University, Chicago; University of Pittsburgh; Miami University; New York University; Ohio State University; University College, Dublin; Trinity College, Dublin; University of California, Irvine; University of Illinois at Chicago; and a host of conferences too numerous to list here in detail. Such opportunities have been priceless in my efforts to clarify the issues involved in this book. Neina Chambers of UCLA, Jeffrey W. Hole of the University of Pittsburgh, and Justin Joyce of UIC were all very able research assistants in this process. I am grateful to each of them.

A deep and heartfelt thank-you goes to the members of my UCLA dissertation committee—Valerie Smith, Emily Apter, and Barbara Packer—for their support not only of the dissertation but of me and of this work at every stage of its development. They have set a standard for the kind of environment and encouragement for learning and intellectual exploration for students that I hope to live up to as a faculty member.

I owe the highest debt of gratitude to my patient and very able dissertation director, Anne K. Mellor. Her expert and detailed readings of the dissertation were always extremely helpful. Without her pointing the way through the numerous texts that make this such a rich and rewarding field of inquiry, this project would have been far more daunting than it was and much less fruitful than it has been. My regard and admiration for her intellect and humanity have only increased throughout the production of this book. She may never know just how much knowing that she believed in me and in my ability to do this work contributed to its completion.

Last, I thank the first person who encouraged me to apply to graduate school at UCLA, recruited me once I had been admitted, routinely checked in with me during my first couple of years there, and always had time to provide some avuncular advice—both solicited and unsolicited. I owe a great deal of thanks to the late Daniel Calder for his intellect, generosity, and support. I wish he could be here to witness the completion of this project.
