Acknowledgments

The completion of this book would not have been possible without the support of many people. First, I am grateful to the incredible group of people that surrounded me as a graduate student at the University of Southern California. Many colleagues and professors at USC—especially Howard Gillman, Judith Stiehm, Sharon Lloyd, Jonathan O’Hara, Dave Bridge, Jillian Medeiros, Amy Below, Jesse Mills, and Art Auerbach—provided vital intellectual and emotional support as I began my research on Frederick Douglass. Alison Renteln and Jim Kincaid read and commented on early versions of this manuscript. Thanks to Alison for teaching me that the formulation of a research agenda is, and ought to be, an exercise of mind and heart. Thanks to Jim for his thoughtful feedback on this project and for inspiring me to think about the vocation of a scholar in a new light. The greatest gift I received while I was at USC was the opportunity to work with Mark Kann. Mark went above and beyond the call of duty as my advisor and mentor. Without Mark’s wisdom, encouragement, and responsiveness, this project would not have been possible. He has taught me so much about writing, teaching, and the history of American political thought.

When I left USC I was fortunate enough to secure my dream job at Linfield College in McMinnville, Oregon. Although Linfield is a small liberal arts college where one’s performance as a teacher matters more than anything else, it has proven to be a wonderful place to do research. I am grateful to all the folks in the Office of Academic Affairs—especially Barbara Seidman, Victoria McGillin, Meridith Symons, Nancy Drickey, and Liz Atkinson—for supporting this project. Faculty Development Grants and Summer Collaborative Research Grants from that office as well as grants from the Institute for Humane Studies, the Acton Institute, and the Jack Miller Center for Teaching American Founding Principles and History have allowed me the time and resources to finish this book. I owe a great debt of gratitude to my colleagues in the Linfield Department of Political Science—Dawn Nowacki, Patrick Cottrell, and Howard Leichter—who have provided much-needed intellectual and moral support. In addition to my marvelous colleagues, I have had the great fortune to work with some fantastic students at Linfield. While teaching them, I have learned much about Frederick Douglass and so many other things. My Linfield research assistants—especially T. Craig Sinclair, Mike Stead, Aila Wallace, and Braden Smith—have been invaluable.

I am also grateful to Robin Condon and her colleagues at the Frederick Douglass Papers Project at Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis in Indianapolis, Indiana. During a visit to the Douglass Papers Project in the summer of 2009 I was able to read many of Douglass’s unpublished letters, speeches, and editorials and I had many great conversations with Robin and her staff. I thank everyone at the Douglass Papers Project for their kindness, professionalism, and assistance.

I would also like to thank Thomas Spragens of Duke University and two anonymous reviewers who read the manuscript for NYU Press. Their thoughtful comments improved this manuscript in innumerable ways. Thanks also to Ilene Kalish, executive editor at NYU Press, and to Aiden Amos, an editorial assistant at NYU Press, who have been incredibly supportive from the proposal stage of this project through to the book you hold in your hands.

Finally, I would like to thank my family and friends. My mom and dad, Kathy and Tony Sr., have been sources of constant support and encouragement. My brothers Tony Jr., Craig, and Scott and my sister Michelle as well as my many aunts, uncles, cousins, nieces, nephews, and friends have provided me with so much love and reminded me of what really matters. And thank you to my wife Emily for listening to me ramble about Frederick Douglass and for being such a great source of love and wonder in my life.
“From this little bit of experience—slave experience—I have elaborated quite a lengthy chapter of political philosophy, applicable to the American people.”
