ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book has benefited from input from many colleagues, friends, and supporters. I am grateful to Rebecca Moore and Laura Vance for reading all or portions of the manuscript and providing very helpful feedback. The book has benefited enormously from comments provided by anonymous reviewers of the manuscript, and I appreciate the time and effort they put into providing me with feedback to improve the book. I thank Jennifer Hammer of New York University Press for her expert editorial guidance.

I thank Henrietta Stockel for input on the book’s discussions of the Chiricahua and Mescalero Apache, and Linda E. Olds for sending me her comments on the psychology chapter. I thank Karma Lekshe Tsomo for her advice on the section on the ordination of Buddhist nuns; Kecia Ali for feedback on issues involving Muslim women and for making me aware of the work of Amina Wadud; Deborah Halter for guidance on Catholic doctrines, documents published by the Vatican, and assistance locating photos; Bishop Jane Via and Bishop Suzanne Thiel of Roman Catholic Womenpriests-USA for information on the Roman Catholic Women Priests movement and its history; Sister Terri Bednarz, R.S.M., for information on the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas and for sharing her New Testament studies expertise with me; and Sister Annmarie Sanders, I.H.M., associate director for communications of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, for checking the paragraphs that I wrote about the LCWR and tensions with the Vatican. Thanks go to Scott Lowe for answering my questions relating to Chinese language matters and to Robert Pearson Flaherty for his assistance with romanization of Korean names.

I thank Cheng pang LEE and Ling HAN for publishing their insightful article, “Mothers and Moral Activists: Two Models of Women’s Social Engagement in Contemporary Taiwanese Buddhism,” in the journal I co-edit, Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions.
Acknowledgments

I have cited their article in this book, and I appreciate their reading and correcting the section in which I discuss Dharma Master Cheng Yen and ShiH Chao-hwei and their respective expressions of social activism. Lee and Han’s insightful article illustrates a strategy I have noted in the movement of women living in conservative religious societies beyond the patriarchal gender role of wife and mother to social activist.

Through my years at Loyola University New Orleans, I have had fruitful conversations with colleagues Tiina Allik and Elizabeth Goodine about feminism and the study of women in religions, and I appreciate their sharing their views with me.

I am grateful to Henry John Drewal, Denis Vejas, the Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts, Shih Chao-hwei and the Hongshi Buddhist Theological School, Jorge Mañes Rubio, Melissa Hammer and Sonia Epstein, and the photographers who have contributed images to Wikimedia Commons for permission to publish the photographs included in this book.

I thank my students at Loyola University New Orleans for the questions, discoveries, and analyses they expressed in my “Women in World Religions” course, which I have taught since the early 1990s. I continue to learn from my students and their explorations into women in religions. One insightful student, Jaime Elizabeth Johnston, is quoted in the conclusion.

I appreciate Robert S. Ellwood’s encouragement of my writing this book many years ago before I was sidetracked by another important research project. I am grateful to have known and been inspired by Sister Fara Impastato, O.P. (1920–2014), the first women professor in the Religious Studies Department at Loyola University New Orleans, who pioneered women’s studies at the university. Lastly, my son, Clinton, and husband, Ken, have lived with me during the various periods I was writing this book and attempting to live out the lessons learned in my studies of women in societies and religions; I am glad to have them in my life. This book is dedicated in gratitude to Sister Fara Impastato, Robert S. Ellwood, Clinton Wessinger, and Ken Richards.
