Acknowledgements

Any book is a complex undertaking and something of a journey. We can just about remember where and how we started this, but we do remember clearly all the people that helped us along the way, especially when the direction seemed unclear or the pace began to flag a little. We acknowledge, with gratitude, the generous help and guidance of Sarah Williams, our commissioning editor at Channel View, whose patience in the latter stages was a source of much relief. Once we were underway our families, friends and colleagues provided that very special kind of encouragement and moral support that only comes from those who understand: Robyn Bushell and Russell Staiff at the University of Western Sydney, Glyn Littlewood at York St John University and Rosa Gonzalez at the University of Seville. Our particular thanks go to Christine Mortimer at York St John for wrestling so heroically with the first draft and to Duncan Light who, with patience and immense generosity with his time, effort and scholarship, gently questioned and challenged our often uncertain thoughts. To all of them a monumental thank you and we hope the book repays their support. Its shortcomings, however, are ours and ours alone.
