

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I am very grateful to the three professors who served on my dissertation committee. Janet Johnson guided the long process with a firm hand and sage advice, ever keeping the goal in sight: a finished manuscript. Robert Ritner and I butted heads frequently, but I am convinced that his feedback produced a stronger manuscript. Eugene Cruz-Uribe was the content expert on my team; he knew the subject matter intimately and we agreed that the majority of inscriptions at Philae and the other temples of Lower Nubia were written by Nubians. Cruz fed me a steady stream of references, which broadened my engagement with the subject.

I am profoundly grateful for the complete financial support granted to me by the University of Chicago. As a first-generation, low income, student of color this support was essential to my ability to obtain a doctorate. I believe that I am the only African American woman to hold a Ph.D. in Egyptology. This is no small thing and I hope and believe it to be the beginning of a sea change in the field of Egyptology. I am grateful that the University saw potential in my application and merit in my scholarship. I would also like to acknowledge the University of Pennsylvania, which awarded me the Predoctoral Fellowship for Excellence through Diversity. This allowed me a full year in my own office (“a room of one’s own”) with access to their excellent library – and an escape from mothering duties from Monday to Thursday - during which I completed the longest and most complicated chapter of this work – chapter two.

Finally, I would like to acknowledge the unquestioning support - financial, logistical, and emotional - of my boys’ father, Steve Bumbaugh, who believed in my dream to become an Egyptologist from the very beginning and has supported me no matter how much extra parenting work that meant for him. Thank you.
