THIS BOOK HAS BEEN my hardest and longest marathon. From San Francisco, Los Angeles, Phoenix, and now Chicago, writing this book is probably one of the most solitary, exhausting, and humbling activities in which I have ever engaged in my life. I am indebted to a community of support that sustained me in this journey.

First, I thank all the men and women who participated in this project in the Philippines, Arizona, and Texas for giving life to the transnational process that I try to uncover in this book. I grew up in a migrant family, but the knowledge I possessed prior to entering the field was not even close to what I learned in my research. The labor-brokering process is much more intricate and complicated than I'd known, as brokers showed me, and the struggles and sacrifices of workers much deeper, as I came to see as nurses shared with me their work, dreams, and disappointments. I hope that I have done some justice to representing their perspectives and experiences, although I realize that my representation is partial and my analysis likely to be in disagreement with theirs. Special thanks go to the Philippine Nursing Association of Arizona for opening their doors and introducing me to a vibrant community of Filipino nurses.

At Rutgers University Press, I am grateful to my editor, Adi Hovav, whose enthusiasm for this project has meant the world to me. As this is my first book, I did not know what having an editor meant. Adi not only walked me through the book publishing process, but, much to my amazement, also read through each chapter and worked closely with me on my writing. Adi guided me to find, and in some ways resurrect, my voice. She reminded me about the importance of representation and clarity to engage a wider audience. For this and her patience and understanding of the various life circumstances that affected the production of the book, I am grateful. I appreciate the support that Leslie Mitchner provided to shepherd my book through its final stages. I also thank the supportive and patient staff members at the press—in particular, Marilyn Campbell, Allyson Fields, Suzanne Kellam, Katie Keeran, Beth Kressel, Alicia Nadkarni, Karen Baliff Ornstein, and Michael Tomolonis—who shepherded my book through the copyediting, production, marketing, and advertising processes. I am also very grateful to Romaine Perin for her careful, thorough, and expert copyediting.

I also owe my survival of this process to the mentorship that I received along the way. The project began during my graduate studies at the University of California, San Francisco, and I am indebted to Howard Pinderhughes, Adele Clarke, Virginia Olesen, and Aihwa Ong for believing in and supporting it. Howard, my advisor, gave me the intellectual autonomy to pursue this project but also taught me how to survive graduate school. I appreciate his confidence in my ability to craft a project that extended beyond the intellectual confines of the department. I thank Ginnie for her generous feedback as I began working through the process of writing and Adele for her unrelenting support and “you go, girl!” sentiments that continue to sustain me beyond graduate school. I thank Aihwa Ong for her enthusiasm about the project and for her often firm, yet gentle, encouragement to get the book out.

As a postdoctoral fellow at the Institute of Labor and Employment at the University of California, Los Angeles, I was fortunate to be under the wings of Ruth Milkman, who provided me the mentorship, intellectual space, and resources to complete the second phase of the project. I especially thank Ruth for helping me shape the book during its initial stages and for her unyielding support in the career transitions that fundamentally enabled me to complete the book.

At Arizona State University (ASU) at the West Campus, where I landed my first job and where the actual writing began, I am grateful to several people. First and foremost I want to acknowledge my Ethnic Studies Manuscript Group—Shari Collins Chobanian, Gloria Cuádras, C. Alejandra Elenes, and Michelle Telléz. I thank them for reading various incarnations of the manuscript and for their honest and incisive comments throughout as we met weekly and even during the summer months in Phoenix when the heat made it difficult to be outdoors. This community of women acted much like an intellectual boot camp of sorts where many healthy disagreements and debates occurred, but it was also a place of refuge and inspiration. The book is better not only because of the feedback they provided but also because of what I learned from their work. I thank Shari for sharing her passion about environmental refugees. I am grateful to Alejandra for bringing me into the world of La Llorona, La Virgen de Guadalupe, and La Malinche and look forward to seeing her book. I was happy to have a glimpse of Gloria's oral history project and her valiant efforts to recuperate the long-forgotten contributions of Mexican American migrant workers to the economy of Litchfield Park as they toiled and lived in its labor camps. I am inspired by the work that Michelle has done with the community of Maclovio Rojas and her commitment to give voice to their struggles. Her work will, undoubtedly be a brilliant book. I am honored to have been part of this community and am indebted for their friendships and ongoing support.

Second, I appreciate the time with my ASU colleagues at Social and Behavioral Sciences—an eclectic interdisciplinary group. Special thanks to Mary Burseson, Luis Cabrera, David Coon, Julie Murphy Erfani, Sonya Glavac, Sara Gutierrez, Jeff Juris, Tom Keil, Kristin Koptiuch, Dawn McQuiston-Surrett, Jose Nañez, Luis Plascencia, William Simmons, Barbara Tinsley, and Suzanne Vaughan. Mary and David's sense of humor especially came in handy during those long nights where we competed to see who could stay in their offices the latest. Bill Simmons offered welcoming distractions to the book through the Border Justice events. Luis Cabrera's weekly check-ins about my "progress" kept me on my toes, as did Suzanne's gentle reminders to keep my eyes on my research when times got tough. I appreciate the conversations with Luis Plascencia—a fellow Sun Valley Junior High School graduate—whose interests in migration and theoretical insights provided a much needed intellectual support. I am indebted to Kristin Koptiuch for her faith in my work, for showing me the excitement of teaching, and for letting me be an anthropologist. Barbara Tinsley gave me the time I needed work on the manuscript at a crucial time and for that I am grateful. A special mention goes to Lisa Kammerlocher, the Social and Behavioral Sciences Department's liaison librarian extraordinaire, whose friendship, humor, and sense of social justice also made ASU so welcoming.

At the University of Illinois at Chicago (UIC), I am fortunate to have found a supportive home in sociology with colleagues who have made this transition easy and helped provide a space where I can finish the last leg of this marathon. I especially thank Maria Krysan and Tony Orum for being my mentoring team and Tony for reading portions of the manuscript. Nilda Flores Gonzalez has been a superb role model and has gone through great lengths to welcome me to the sociology department. I thank Laurie Schaffner for her critical “interventions,” kindness, and faith in me and my work. I appreciate the encouragement and insights that Richard Barrett, Cedric Herring, and Pamela Popielarz have extended to me with regard to my scholarship and possible ways of pursuing further some of the ideas that stem from this book. I am thankful for Barbara Risman’s mentorship, enthusiasm, and ability to create an intellectual community with a research culture firmly in place. I deeply appreciate her enthusiasm toward my work and for helping to bring me to UIC. I am glad to have picked the office I did because it put me in close proximity with Lorena Garcia, who has also been instrumental in my ability to complete the book. Apart from our sharing many late nights in the office and moments of insanity, the writing accountability group she formed with Rooshey Hasnain kept me on track and saved my life. This book could not have been completed without Lorena and Rooshey’s encouragement and inspiration. I am very much indebted to one of our graduate students, Michael Rodriguez Muñiz, who generously provided his time, skill, and creativity in generating the amazing image for the book cover. I also thank the sociology staff—Candace Hoover, Olga Padilla, Amanda Stewart, and Teri Williams—whose daily support allows me to do the work that I do.

My colleagues in Asian American studies and gender and women’s studies have also provided numerous types of support in this journey. Special thanks to Jennie Brier, Mark Chiang, Judith Gardiner, John D’Emilio, Elena Gutierrez, Helen Jun, Norma Moruzzi, and Barbara Ransby for extending their support to me and welcoming me to their communities. I am especially thankful to Gayatri Reddy and Kevin Kumashiro for their guidance, protection, and friendship; their generosity of spirit, leadership, and sense of fairness never cease to amaze me. I am also glad to know that we have a shared passion for food and bubble tea. I am fortunate to be at a campus with a vibrant Asian American community and grateful for the support I have received from Karen Su, Elvin Chan, Corinne Kodama, and the Asian American Resource and Cultural Center. Beyond UIC, I am lucky to have colleagues and friends like Rick Bonus, Grace Chang, Emily Ignacio, Belinda Lum, Martin Manalansan, and Robyn Rodriguez—all of whom have cheered me on and offered invaluable words of wisdom along the way, especially during moments of crisis and challenges.

My ability to do this work is made possible by various funding sources. I'm indebted to the Fulbright 2001–2002 grant I received to conduct fieldwork in the Philippines and extend my gratitude to the Philippine-American Educational Foundation, which provided a support system that eased the process for doing research in a country that was then foreign to me: Dr. Calata, Gigi, EC, Mila, Marjorie, Susie, Yolly, and Fred. It is through this grant that I met an incredibly talented cohort of Fulbright grantees who provided welcoming diversions to work: Dalisay Estrada, Michelle Favis, Robert Ingenito, Jane Pater, Rona-Kathleen Reodica, and Annie Senner. I only regret that I have lost touch with them and hope that this book will help us reconnect. The Social Development Research Center of De La Salle University hosted and welcomed me as a visiting researcher. I especially thank Dr. "Tata" Lamberte for her guidance and the enthusiasm and support she has shown and Yoyie, Weng, and Rommel for their sense of humor and for helping me adjust to the Philippine way of life. At the University of California, San Francisco, the Eugena-Cota Robles Fellowship, the NIGMS training grant, the UCSF School of Nursing Century Club, and the University of California's President's Fellowship also provided invaluable financial support. The research funds provided by the University of California Institute of Labor and Employment postdoctoral fellowship in 2003–2004 allowed me to conduct fieldwork interviewing Filipino nurses in Texas. At ASU, the New College of Interdisciplinary Arts and Sciences Scholarship, Research, and Creative Activities grant of 2005–2006 provided the financial support to carry out the last phase of this project.

Most important, I thank my family and friends for their patience, forgiveness, and understanding for the times when I couldn't always return e-mail or phone calls, for the late birthday presents, and my for turning down several family gatherings. In the Philippines, I thank my aunt, Belen Bahia, who made me feel at home and helped ease my homesickness for being away from my family. I thank her for forgiving the times I often disappeared to do my fieldwork and for insisting I take the time to enjoy the company of family. Her joyful spirit is contagious and I only regret that I couldn't spend more time with her. My longtime friends William Duncan, Everardo Gutierrez, Victoria Manyarrows, and Teresa Scherzer have been avid supporters who, at different points in this journey, have given me the encouragement I needed.

I am lucky to have a family who has kept me grounded and thank them for inspiring me every day. My mom understood my decision to become a different kind of doctor and her everyday generosity, patience, and determined sense of survival are humbling. My late father's intellectual legacies and experiences as a migrant worker laid the foundation for this work. My sister, Corinne (Anne), whose strength and independence make her one of the most amazing woman warriors I know, and my brother, John—who has sacrificed much to provide for his daughter—are a source of strength.

I am also grateful to have wonderful in-laws—Roberta, Jim, Bob, and Ilene, who have always shown interest in my work and cheered me on through this process. I thank my ten-year-old niece, Adree, and my two-year-old nephew, Brody, who both give me immense joy and inspiration and who provided welcome diversions from writing. I only hope that this book can be as captivating to them as reading Twilight or watching Elmo.

Most of all, I thank Robert Meyers Jr., my husband and partner of fifteen years, who undertook this journey with me from beginning to end. I thank him for reading every page of this manuscript, for creating a home environment conducive to writing, and sometimes, for letting me be crazy without question or judgment. He gave me the push I needed at crucial points, helped prop me up whenever I stumbled, provided the sustenance for me to face the next hurdle. But most of all, he kept me moving forward and reminded me to always have faith.
