The adventure began with a two-day workshop on creative writing in social research, in Sheffield, in November 2018. The workshop was co-ordinated by this book’s authors and attended by its contributors and others. Each person attending had the opportunity to give a short performative presentation and to participate in the ensuing discussions. Their responses were inspirational and took many forms – from facilitated exercises to stand-up comedy, and from academic reflections on creative writing to creatively written stories and songs, performed in the workshop. We wanted to work together and to share and encourage others to explore the possibilities of creative writing in social research, and this book is the outcome of our collaboration during and after the workshop. Those who attended the workshop and contributed to this book are credited elsewhere for their individual writing, but here we want to acknowledge them in a broader sense: for their part in a collective project, which they entered with generosity, creativity and fun. They are: Alke Gröppel-Wegener, Andrew McMillan, Hayden Lorimer, Hester Parr, Julia Molinari, Kate Fox, Katherine Collins, Kay Inckle, Kitrina Douglas, Kristina Diprose, Mary Evans, Nafhesa Ali, Rowan Jaines, Ruth Raynor, Sarah McNicol and Stacy Bias. We also wish to acknowledge co-authors, who contributed to the finished contributions in this book: Ruth Olden and David Carless. Other participants in the workshop, who contributed to this collective adventure, included Brendan Stone, Safina Mazhar, Kirit Patel and Michal Kupis.

We are also grateful to others who have supported and encouraged us in this project: Kate Pahl, Cate Watson, Ben Clayton, Claire Chambers, Alistair Roy, Afshan D’souza-Lodhi, Les Back, Jennifer Mason, Nick Sousanis, Susie Weller, Chris Bailey, Sarah de Leeuw and Maggie O’Neill.

At Policy Press, Catherine Gray helped to shape this book from the outset, and Philippa Grand supported its completion. Thank you both.

The workshop was supported by the Arts and Humanities Research Council (AHRC) through funding for a project entitled Storying Relationships (AH/N003926/1).

Finally, we would like to acknowledge our learning from the students we have been fortunate to work with – Richard at the University of Sheffield, and Helen through her workshops in universities worldwide. Creative writing for social research blurs the boundaries between students, teachers, researchers and participants: we learn from each other, share ideas and create together.
