Much like raising a child, it takes a village to write a book. All errors in what proceeds are rightfully mine, but I have accrued a village-worth of thank yous and unpayable debts in writing this book.

First, it wouldn’t be a book without the great folk at Bristol University Press – thanks especially Anna Richardson, Freya Trand and Emily Watt, as well as their less visible colleagues who indexed, copy edited, designed, printed and otherwise made this book function. Thanks also to Agatha Herman, who saw the merit in the book and supported it and me through the process. Her initial support as series editor made it a serious endeavour rather than a pipedream.

This book grew out of my doctoral work at the London School of Economics and Political Science, so thanks to the many colleagues there who helped develop the work, my classmates and especially my examiners, Emma Jackson and Andrew Cumbers. Thanks to the NYLON writing group who were my lifeline back to the university when living in London was not an option.

In particular, I owe thanks especially to Don Slater – who first believed in the idea, and helped shape it – and to my primary supervisor, David Madden – who pushed me to define and refine, and whose thoughtfulness, support and precision helped hone sprawling ideas into arguments. I am grateful too to the Economic and Social Research Council as this work was supported by a full doctoral studentship (grant number 1510541).

My time at the University of Glasgow has greatly shaped the book. Thanks especially are due to Andrew Cumbers who has been a brilliant support, mentor and principal investigator, and who encouraged me to develop my own work alongside his grants. Thanks also to the community gardens folk in the Adam Smith Business School – Deirdre Shaw (another fabulous principal investigator), Bob McMaster and Stephanie Anderson – for encouragement, collegiality and willingness to meet outside; and the broader municipalizations group, who made the day-to-day much more fun. Thanks to Kirsteen Paton, whose enthusiasm was a real boost at a critical moment, and to the Food Geographies Writing Group, who read sections of this book and read with it – thanks for wading through the postdoctoral soup with me. To the many others who spoke with me, asked awkward questions, and showed even the mildest interest – thank you. Academia would be nothing without you all.

I owe a huge debt of thanks to the whole host of people who believed I could write a book, especially the extended clan of Traills and Seatons who we rely on a great deal. Thank you to my many sisters; the real ones, Susan and Anne, without whom I’d be much less strange; to Julia Brainin, who never doubted and always turned up; to Sarah Crook, for sharing the joys and the aches of academic-parenting; to Claire Norman, for the various medical advice and moral support, despite my insistence she’s not a real doctor; to Sophie Wawro, who let me chew her ear off and sleep on her sofa too many times to count.

Thanks most of all to my little family: to Andrew, Felix and Mabel, who kept me sane, made me laugh, kept my ego in check, and brought me motivational posters. I can’t say it has been easy to balance a young family, academic life and a pandemic; but I wouldn’t change it for the world. They keep me grounded and challenged in equal measure, and I love them all very much.

The biggest thanks of course I owe to the many folks at Woodlands Community Garden, Woodlands Community Café, the North Kelvin Meadow and the Children’s Wood. Without them there would be no research, and I can only hope to have done justice to the brilliant spaces you have built.
