Acknowledgments

Being immersed in poison gas for years now, I would like to acknowledge the individuals along the way who have helped to guide me through the sometimes murky vapours.

Four happy years were spent at Trent University in Peterborough, Ontario, and in between rugby matches, two important classes on the World Wars with Professor Stuart Robson introduced me to studying the “new military history.” A gifted teacher and kind soul, Stuart Robson exemplifies the best of Trent University. Professor Jack English, then at Queen’s University, also gave helpful advice on gas warfare and strengthened my understanding of the many nuances of Canadian military history. Special thanks must also be extended to Professor Ronald Haycock, whose guidance as my thesis supervisor at the Royal Military College of Canada was just one more burden added to his heavy load as Dean of Graduate Studies. It goes without saying that he deserves special credit and a place in academic royalty when, after he asked for an introductory chapter to gauge my progress, he received two hundred and fifty pages instead. He simply murmured that this was a good start.

Interspersed between the academic school year was summer employment at the National Archives of Canada. Managers such as Jim Burant, Carol White, and Gabrielle Blais ensured that I had interesting and educational work. More specific to this project, I had the pleasure to work with both Dr. Bob McIntosh and Paul Marsden in the Military Archives section of the Government Archives Division. Not only was it an intellectually stimulating and challenging environment, but their good nature, friendly advice, and collective wisdom added immeasurably to this manuscript. Tim Dube, military archivist for the Manuscript Division, must also be thanked for keeping me apprised of any incoming collections relating to gas warfare. Owen Cooke, Bill Rawling, Dennis Julian, and Lieutenant-Colonel Ian McCullough also took time out from their busy schedules to help strengthen various aspects of this work. The sometimes massive borrowing of books leaves me indebted to the understanding library staff at the National Library of Canada, the Royal Military College of Canada, and the National Archives Library.

Upon completion of the initial thesis, there was the always disconcerting process of an oral defence. Not only was this normally nerve-wracking experience made pleasant by the kind words of Dr. Steve Harris, senior historian of the Directorate of History and Heritage, but his ongoing enthusiasm for my work stimulated and energized me to further research and rework the original manuscript. With these significant additions, Steve Harris read through the manuscript again, thoroughly editing and imparting valued academic skills. At UBC Press I wish to thank Emily Andrew and Camilla Jenkins, who helped to guide this work to publication.

The highest praise, however, must be reserved for my father, an editor of the highest quality, Dr. Terry Cook. Throughout my life he has taught me the mysteries of writing while sharing with me his love for history. This guidance has played no small part in my passion for history. An international scholar, he has always made the time to be genuinely interested in my work. And that has made working with gas all the more enjoyable.

Despite the fact that it sometimes felt like all work and no play, I was buoyed by my friends in Ottawa, Kingston, and Peterborough, who were kind enough to remind me that there were other things in life than poison gas. Trips home always bolstered my spirit, especially reuniting with my brother Graham, who has always played an important role in my life with his sly wit and piercing observations. Additional praise and recognition must be given to my parents, Sharon and Terry, whose patience, support, and love over the years have produced a fairly well-rounded kid. No series of acknowledgments, however, can make up for the years of 6:00 a.m. hockey practices.

As anyone who has written a book knows, an unfair burden falls to the significant other. My then girlfriend, later fiancée, and now wife, Tracey, who survived the gas cloud and paper explosion that loomed constant in our one-bedroom Kingston apartment, has been a continual inspiration to me. Not only did she have the unenviable task of reading through the first draft, but she has always supported me in this lengthy endeavour. And although she probably knows more about gas warfare than she ever expected or wanted to, I credit her with my ability to bring this to fruition. As my best friend, to her must go my deep-felt thanks and love.

Despite the encouragement and guidance of many, the mistakes are the author's alone.

An honest attempt has been made to secure permission for all material used, and if there are errors or omissions, these are wholly unintentional and the publisher and author will be grateful to learn of them.
