The support of many individuals and institutions was integral in bringing this book to fruition. I am indebted to the tremendous supervision and guidance of Allan English, and I was always able to count on the wisdom and insights of Donald Akenson and Jane Errington. While I was at Queen’s University, the opportunity to design and teach my own course, History 401: Canada and the Great War, helped me to develop as a better historian. While the process of researching and writing is often an individual enterprise, as I learned from Dr. English, academic work is always improved by collaboration and networking. I appreciate the support and advice I received from many friends and colleagues throughout work on this project. I benefited from the encouragement of Craig Leslie Mantle and Geoffrey Hayes, whose own work on Canadian officership helped shape my fascination in the topic. The completion of this book took place while I was a Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council (SSHRC) postdoctoral fellow at the Canadian War Museum. In this role, I have shared Tim Cook’s enthusiasm for military history and learned from his insights about the research process and the importance of sharing stories about the past.

My historical research would not have been possible without the assistance of archivists and other staff at Library and Archives Canada (LAC), the Directorate of History and Heritage, and the National Archives in the United Kingdom. The digitization work of the Canadiana Héritage project has opened tremendous research possibilities to all historians, and I was fortunate to have access to thousands upon thousands of scanned court martial records at my fingertips. Much of my archival research depended on analysts at LAC who diligently reviewed my many requests for access to information on ex-officers’ restricted personnel files. In particular, I wish to thank Kevin Joynt for his knowledge and assistance in navigating this process. For issues of copyright and licensing Crown material, I also appreciate the prompt work of Cédric Lafontaine at LAC.

Funding from Queen’s University in the way of awards and travel grants, and a SSHRC doctoral fellowship, made research for this project possible. I am honoured for my book to join the Studies in Canadian Military History series at UBC Press, and I appreciate the financial support of the Canadian War

Museum for its publication. I have also benefited from the Histoire sociale/Social History 2018 best article prize for “Worthless Cheques and Financial Honour: Cheque Fraud and Canadian Gentlemen Officers during the First World War” and from the Canadian Journal of History 2020 Linda F. Dietz essay prize for “Conduct Unbecoming an Officer and a Doctor: Medical Attitudes toward Homosexuality and the Court Martial of Dr. Percy Ryberg.” This book builds on and greatly expands themes and arguments contained in these earlier articles, which in turn depended on the valuable suggestions and feedback of many editors and peer reviewers. I am grateful to UBC Press for its enthusiastic reception of Scandalous Conduct, and I am especially thankful to editors Randy Schmidt and Megan Brand for guiding me through the publication process. A special thanks to Camilla Blakeley for her meticulous copy-editing.

Most of all I thank my family for their constant love and support. My father and mother, Michael and Barbara, have always encouraged me to pursue my interests and provided the caring environment to make all of my success possible. My older brother, Jeff, has always been a source of support and humour, especially related to our shared perspectives on academia.

Any errors or omissions in this work are of course mine alone. But as many of the disgraced and expelled ex-officers featured in this book understood, nobody’s perfect.
