

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book would have never been written without the efforts of many people. Our first debt of gratitude is to David Pervin, the editor at the University of Chicago Press who approached us asking if we would be interested in writing a book about biology and organizational behavior. David was a champion of this book from the beginning. We also owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to of the book's contributors. They kindly and patiently worked through revisions to produce a marvelous set of chapters.

The School of Business of the National University of Singapore (NUS) hosted a week-long conference in the spring of 2011, during which the book's contributors discussed the first drafts of their chapters and solidified a common thematic vision for the book. We would like to thank NUS's Business School and its dean, Bernard Yeung, for their gracious hospitality and generosity in bringing authors from around the world to Singapore for a week. Several staff members and graduate students from NUS's Department of Management and Organization worked very hard to make the conference a success. Our thanks go to Don Jia Qing Chen, Sally Han, and Wendy Lim.

Joe Jackson took over for David as our editor once the second round of drafts was in. During this transition, Christie Henry, the Press's editorial director for the social sciences, helped keep communication and revisions moving forward. Joe guided us through responding to the outside reviewers' comments on the entire book and making subsequent revisions. Joe also did final editing on all of the chapters. Our outside reviewers gave us excellent feedback on the initial proposal and on the first draft of the book.

Steve spent a sabbatical semester at the Department of Management and Organization at NUS while he and Rich completed the book. Steve is grateful for the support and hospitality he received from Rich and the Business School at NUS. Thanks also go to Central Michigan University for additional travel assistance for Steve and sabbatical support. Particular thanks go to his dean, Pamela Gates, and his department chair, Hajime Otani. Shanna Palmer and Robin Decker ably assisted with word processing.

We are grateful to Kingsley Browne, who graciously read and commented on the entire manuscript. Kingsley is a scholar's scholar, with a wide grasp of the literature in evolutionary psychology and its intellectual history. His perceptive comments were invaluable.

Finally, we are grateful to the University of Chicago Press. It has a reputation as one of the great university presses, and our experience confirms this. Our editors were flexible and supportive of creativity and scholarly independence, while also maintaining an ethos of quality, intellectual rigor, and interdisciplinary scholarship.
