“What do you have that you have not received?” Augustine often quoted 1 Corinthians 4:7 as a reminder that while his faults were his own, what he accomplished he owed to the grace of others. Writing this book I have felt similarly about those who have sustained me along the way.

A fateful conversation with Jean-Luc Marion, on the corner of Dorchester and 59th Street in Chicago’s Hyde Park, gave rise to this project. From that moment he has affirmed its development in countless ways. David Tracy’s incomparable wisdom and openness continue to inspire me. He teaches by word and deed. For the better part of a decade, in two different institutional settings, I had the honor to study with Amy Hollywood, an exemplary scholar and a tireless champion of her students. I count myself lucky to call her a mentor and a friend.

Without the encouragement of my colleagues at the University of Chicago I could not have completed this project. I am grateful to Arnold Davidson for his guidance and generosity in reading this manuscript. My fascination with modern German philosophy I owe in part to Françoise Meltzer, whose lectures gave me a new perspective on Kant. Special thanks are due as well to Richard Rosengarten, for his faith in this project and for his support at every step along the way; Margaret Mitchell, for steadying me at key moments; and Paul Mendes-Flohr for his encouragement. It is a privilege to work at Swift Hall alongside so many admirable individuals. I am grateful to Dan Arnold, Jeff Stackert, and Catherine Brekus for their friendship and insight over the years. My ongoing conversations with Simeon Chavel, Franklin I. Gamwell, Clark Gilpin, Kevin Hector, Willemien Otten, Jim Robinson, Susan Schreiner, and Christian Wedemeyer have invigorated me. Over the years I have profited greatly from the mentorship of Bernard McGinn and Kathryn Tanner. Thanks as well to my students at the University of Chicago, with whom I have explored many of the ideas in this book.

The Georges Lurcy Charitable and Educational Trust supported this project, allowing me to study at the University of Paris IV, Sorbonne, and the Institut d'Études Augustiniennes. I also wish to thank the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation and the Charlotte W. Newcombe Foundation for their support of this project. During the 2005–2006 academic year, the University of Chicago Center in Paris provided a home away from home. For this I am grateful to Robert Morrissey. Conversations with the following individuals helped me to clarify the stakes of my argument: Sophie-Jan Arrien, Bobby Baird, Charles Fox, Michael Kessler, Karla Pollmann, Kenneth Reinhard, Claude Romano, Eric Santner, Christoph Schmidt, and Christian Sommer. I am particularly grateful to Thomas Meyer for our conversations during the 2011–2012 academic year, and to many wonderful colleagues at Williams College, including Denise Buell, Edan Dekel, Alexandra Garbarini, Jason Josephson, Keith McPartland, Bernie Rhie, and Christian Thorne. Thanks as well to my teachers at Dartmouth College: Susan Ackerman, Nancy Frankenberry, Ronald Green, Kevin Reinhart, and the late Charles Stinson.

An earlier version of chapter 2 appeared as "A Difficult Proximity: The Figure of Augustine in Heidegger's Path," Journal of Religion 91, no. 3 (July 2011): 365–96. Thanks to Sylvain Camilleri for reading and discussing the material in this chapter. I am grateful to Kathryn Lofton for inviting me to present a version of chapter 5 in the Yale Religious Studies workshop, and to Linn Tonstad and Noreen Khawaja for their valuable feedback.

In preparing the manuscript for publication I often looked to my editor, Elizabeth Branch Dyson. She has my gratitude for her patience and wise counsel as she saw this project through to completion. Thanks as well to Kathryn Krug for her expert editorial assistance. The publication of this book in the Religion and Postmodernism series affords me the opportunity to thank the series editor Tom Carlson, whose work I have admired since I first began my graduate studies. I would also like to thank the anonymous readers on the manuscript for their feedback.

In the solitude of writing I have reflected often upon my father's passion for inquiry and my mother's generosity of spirit. They have encouraged me at every step, even when I gave full voice to the frustrations that accompany writing a book. I am grateful to my sister for her love. My heartfelt thanks are due to Mary Tabor and Del Persinger, and Alan and Bonnie Hammerschlag for their unfailing support and patience over the years. The same holds true for my extended family and for my friends: Sarabnh Levy-Brightman, Charles Stang, Jeffrey Israel, and Dina A.-R. Israel. In the years that I've devoted to this book my daughter has grown effortlessly in grace and loveliness, reminding me each day of the passage of time and the promise of the future. Finally, my deepest gratitude is reserved for the woman whose insight and philosophical acumen, whose sympathies and steadfast love have seen me through the daily travails of this work: Sarah, you are the joy of my mornings.
