Acknowledgments

Before turning to individuals, I wish to name the five universities in which I have taught and their presidents who befriended and supported me beyond ordinary expectations: Drew University (Fred G. Holloway, President); Vanderbilt University (Alexander Heard, Chancellor); University of Montana, Missoula (Robert Pantzer, President); State University of New York, Stony Brook (John Toll, President), State University of New York System (Ernest Boyer, Chancellor; Elizabeth Luce Moore, Chairman, SUNY Board of Trustees); Boston University (John Silber, President).

In the six decades I have taught in these universities, I have had colleagues and students in such numbers as to make it impossible to name even a fraction of them here. I limit myself to students I have known relatively recently at Boston University. My university seminars have been the primary site for the development of my thought in the period that has seen the emergence of this book. In these seminars, which have been devoted to the close reading of primary texts by major philosophers and theologians from the Axial Age to the present, students have been encouraged to read thoughtfully, to think the subjects as these figures thought them, then to “afterthink” the subjects in their own way. I have never assigned my own texts to be read in a class. But it always transpires that when we together are discussing and afterthinking a text, some small part of my afterthinking will come in to play. I may hope that with the present thought-experiment those students may now see where such lines of reference can possibly lead.

I single out for acknowledgment and special gratitude:
My research assistants in approximate chronological order, with their research interests in parentheses: “Jamie” Sandra Barkey (Flint) (religion and classics); Alina Feld (acedia and the Seven Deadly Sins); Sean Dempsey (religion and literature, William Butler Yeats, Wallace Stevens); Garth Green (Kant and “inner sense”); Giacomo Leoni (legacy and inheritance/“passing on”). Secretary and dear friend Christopher Tuttle (classical and Near Eastern archaeology); administrative assistant and Socratic conversationalist Eric Helmer (Emmanuel Levinas). Christopher Link (Lacan and Bataille); Kirk Wulf (William Blake); Nicholas Genevieve-Tweed (Schelling); Josh Hasler (Cormac McCarthy); Andy Linscott (Herman Melville); Gregory Stackpole (Eastern Orthodox mystics); and Elizabeth Harcourt (sommelier extraordinaire!).

My highest praise and deepest gratitude are reserved for Dr. Lissa McCullough, independent scholar, whose The Religious Philosophy of Simone Weil (2014) sets the standard for that most mindful of twentieth-century mystics. Without her editorial insight, craft, and skill this book would not have cried birth. I am in her debt incalculably.

For the love, patience, and forbearance of my family—my wife Fern, son Morgan and daughter-in-law Patti, son Bracken and daughter-in-law Victoria—my gratitude is without measure.
