The Economics of Interdependence: Economic Policy in the Atlantic Community
The Council on Foreign Relations, Inc. is a non-profit and non-partisan organization devoted to promoting improved understanding of international affairs through the free exchange of ideas. Its membership of about 1,700 persons throughout the United States is made up of individuals with special interest and experience in international affairs. The Council has no affiliation with, and receives no funding from, the United States government. The Council does not take any position on questions of foreign policy.

The Council publishes the quarterly journal, Foreign Affairs. In addition, from time to time, books and monographs written by members of the council's research staff or visiting fellows, or commissioned by the Council, or (like this book) written by an independent author with critical review contributed by a Council study group, are published with the designation "Council on Foreign Relations Book" or "Council Paper on International Affairs." Any book or monograph bearing that designation is, in the judgment of the Committee on Studies of the Council's board of directors, a responsible treatment of a significant international topic worthy of presentation to the public. All statements of fact and expressions of opinion contained in Council books, monographs, and Foreign Affairs articles are, however, the sole responsibility of their authors.
To my parents
The Atlantic Policy Studies

The Atlantic Policy Studies is a series of major works on the future of the Atlantic Community. There was, in the mid- and late 1960s, an urgent need to re-examine U.S. relations with and policies toward Western Europe; and that project was carried out by the Council on Foreign Relations, with the help of a generous grant from the Ford Foundation. Under the guidance of a Steering Committee with Charles M. Spofford as chairman, the program addressed basic questions in four broad categories: the strategic problems of the Atlantic Alliance in their political context; the external environment of the Atlantic world, specifically Eastern Europe and the transformation going on in the Third World; political relations among the Atlantic nations; and, finally, their economic relations, both among themselves and with the less developed countries. The resulting studies were policy-oriented, seeking not only to describe and forecast but also to prescribe. Their authors were distinguished for their expertise and competence: Henry Kissinger, Zbigniew Brzezinski, Miriam Camps, Stanley Hoffmann, Theodore Geiger, John O. Coppoek, John Pincus, Harold van B. Cleveland, Bela Balassa, and Richard N. Cooper. Individually and as a series, these books contributed greatly to the informed and thoughtful debate on American relations with Western Europe.