My very warmest thanks are due to all my family, friends, and colleagues who have supported the progress and completion of this book. In particular, I could not do what I do without the continuously enriching love, support, conversation, and confidence of those closest to me, in particular Benjamin Bâcle, Clare Forder, and my parents, Ann and John Dodd. I thank my excellent current and former colleagues in the History Department at the University of Huddersfield, particularly Rebecca Gill, Katherine Lewis, Rob Ellis, Barry Doyle, and Pat Cullum, as well as my hardworking coeditors of the journal Oral History. I owe a debt of intellectual gratitude to both Sian Sullivan and Todd Reeser for shifting my ideas around.

The whole of this book was drafted while I was a Fellow at the Collegium de Lyon in 2018–2019, an academic year like no other for so many wonderful reasons, not least the good friends I made in that short time. I express my sincere thanks to the Collegium de Lyon, and particularly to Hervé Joly, for the gift I received through my fellowship that was so precious to me: time. The interviewing I undertook in 2009 was funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council as part of the “Bombing, States and People in Western Europe” project (AH/E007740/1). The interviewing I completed in 2016–2018, as well as my archival listening trip in 2016, was made possible by the Arts and Humanities Research Council/Labex Passés dans le Présent bilateral funding venture, which supported the project “Disrupted Histories, Recovered Pasts: A Cross-Disciplinary Analysis and Cross-Case Synthesis of Oral Histories and History in Post-Conflict and Postcolonial Contexts” (AH/N504579/1).
My gratitude also extends to the Oral History Series editors at Columbia University Press and the editorial team there, who received my manuscript with enthusiasm and supported its completion.

Finally, no oral history is possible without the courage of the people who share their memories with archives and researchers, often without knowing what may become of them. Thanks, first, to the interviewers and archives who have thought to collect stories and have let me listen to them, and particularly to Julien Rocipon and Philippe Béquia for their friendly generosity. As for the interviewees, sharing memories is a deeply personal and risky endeavor. I cannot thank them enough for how they have enriched my understanding and knowledge. To those people I interviewed personally, thank you for your great goodwill and kind hospitality, for the lunches, cakes, and coffees. And to all of the interviewees who volunteered to be recorded, your stories and experiences inspire everything that follows.

It is possible that these people may not like, or might not have liked (many are no longer with us), what I have written about them. I am certain that I get them wrong at times; how could I not? I make no secret that this is my interpretation of their stories, just one approach of any number that are possible. I hope that they would ultimately recognize that, right or wrong, I am interested in their worlds, I think their memories matter, and I have done my best to listen.
