ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book would have never come to being without the encouragement of Mark Ulyanov, who suggested the Yi Zhou shu as an interesting research project during my undergraduate studies at Moscow State University. I am also greatly indebted to Dirk Meyer, who supervised my PhD research at Oxford and who has been exceptionally supportive as a colleague and a friend ever since, and to Rens Krijgsman, whose friendly and competent presence was a comparably important part of my Oxford education. Robert Chard, Peter Ditmanson, Barend ter Haar, and Richard Parkinson offered much useful advice during my PhD work, and Lothar von Falkenhausen, Christoph Harbsmeier, Lea Kantor, Maria Khayutina, Robin McNeal, Frank Sanders, Edward Shaughnessy, Ondřej Škrabal, Corina Smith, Kai Vogelsang, and the anonymous reviewers provided much useful feedback during the subsequent stages. Numerous times, I greatly benefited from the advice and assistance of the extremely competent people whom I was fortunate to meet in different countries: Dega Deopik and Konstantin Tertitsky of Moscow State University; Sergey Dmitriev of the Russian Academy of Sciences; George Starostin of the Russian State University for the Humanities; David Schaberg of the University of California, Los Angeles; Chen Jian, Liu Jiao, Liu Zhao, and Zhang Fuguan of Fudan University; Chen Wei of Wuhan University; James Benson, Henrietta Harrison, Robert Mayer, Jessica Rawson, Anna Sehnalova, and Joshua Seufert of Oxford University; Hirase Takao, Koteru Atsushi, and Suzuki Mai of Tokyo University; Yanaka Shin’ichi of Japan Women's University; and Tang Jigen and Zhou Yongming of SUSTech. I am particularly grateful to Martin Kern, whose critical remarks were instrumental in helping me develop some of the more daring claims of this book. Li Feng, the editor of the Tang Center Series for Early China, offered much invaluable assistance during the final stage of my work. Throughout this long project, I have received generous support from a number of institutions, to whom I remain deeply grateful: the Chinese government, which funded my formative study visits to China during the undergraduate and MA years; the Clarendon Fund and Wolfson College, Oxford, which made my study in Oxford possible; the Chiang Ching-Kuo Foundation, whose grant allowed me to spend an academically rewarding term at Tokyo University in 2015–2016; and the Confucius Institute, which enabled me to conduct a series of visits to the Center for Research on Chinese Excavated Classics and Paleography at Fudan University in 2017–2018. After the completion of my PhD, I was given the luxury to rethink and elaborate my research within the extremely supportive environments of Merton College, Oxford, and SUSTech in Shenzhen. Having received all this support is a privilege, and one can only hope that the resulting book, at least to some extent, justifies the impressive multicultural effort on which it builds.
