I am grateful to Yoram Allon, for embracing the possibilities of the project, and to Ryan Groendyk, my editor at Columbia University Press, for his support and his patience. Thanks to Kathryn Jorge for sterling support through the final stages of this book and also to Maddy Hamey-Thomas for insightful attention and suggestions to the manuscript during the copyediting process. I am also indebted to the anonymous reviewers for several stages of this book: they helped me clarify ideas and, even more importantly, think about future work in terms of the directions that could be taken next. The expert comments of my friends and colleagues Empar Barranco, Cora Pearlman, and Rosi Song helped to further shape the final version. The last stages of this volume hit the wall of the Covid lockdowns and closures, and checking materials became slow and difficult. I am grateful to Jaap Kooijman, who helped me with essential material.

I am lucky to work with a wonderful group of colleagues at Oxford Brookes University, who are an inspiration and an example. Special thanks to Daniela Treveri-Gennari, Gov Chandran, Lindsay Steenberg, Paolo Russo, James Cateridge, and Warren Buckland.

Musicals have been my passion since childhood and writing The Pop Musical has been part of a journey to understand the genre's continuing hold on me, as well as to broaden my horizons in terms of the kinds of music the genre can engage with. This love has been nurtured through the years by friends, internet groups, and mentors, and has been shaped by the work of such insightful academic fans of the genre such as Richard Dyer, to whose work I owe more than he can possibly realize. Most of the writing took place at my London house on Great Russell Street. Through the years, the place has been a haven for artists and writers. For me, everybody there is family, and their encouragement has been crucial to keep me going.

Finally, a project so deeply rooted in my life is indebted to my partner Joan Matabosch, who has put up with odd choices for home viewing and unexpected outbursts of Motown classics.
