ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I gratefully acknowledge the stimulus and help afforded by graduate students in my seminars at Yale University, the work and devotion of my research assistant, Miss Joy Day, and the intent literary vigilance of my good friend David Klein. Thanks are also due to Asger Aaboe for drawing many beautiful graphs. I am further indebted to Yale University Press for permission to reproduce figures from Science Since Babylon which I published with them in 1962; to the McGraw-Hill Book Company for permission to reproduce the graph on development of accelerators from M. S. Livingston and J. P. Blewett, Particle Accelerators; to the Addison-Wesley Publishing Company for the graph on growth of cities from G. K. Zipf, Human Behavior and the Principle of Least Effort; and to the Cambridge University Press for permission to use an adaption of a figure from D'Arcy W. Thompson, Growth and Form.
