I began thinking about writing this book more than a decade ago. At the time, I was working in the Department of International Politics at Aberystwyth University. My colleagues and friends there encouraged me and gave me the confidence to pursue the project, and I thank all of them.

The generous research leave provision at Aberystwyth allowed me to spend a year in Washington, DC, at the outset. There, David Painter hosted me as a visiting fellow in the Department of History at Georgetown University and allowed me to present my initial ideas to his graduate students. I am very grateful to David and hope he will be pleased that the book is finally here. At Georgetown, the late Larry Kaplan also enthusiastically discussed the project with me in its earliest stages. Many other people welcomed me to DC and exchanged ideas with me. Particular thanks go to my friends Tammy Barnett and Steve Galpern.

Funding for the project has come from Aberystwyth University, the University of Essex, and the Eccles Centre at the British Library in London, which awarded me a visiting fellowship.

I have been fortunate to receive valuable feedback from many people on different parts of this book. I especially want to thank Robert Julio Decker, Joseph A. Fry, Barbara Reeves-Ellington, Frank Schumacher, Jay Sexton, Steve Tuffnell, and Kevin Waite. Since coming to the University of Essex, I have been lucky to work with wonderful colleagues who have supported me along the way. I am especially grateful to members of the Political Cultures and Citizenship research cluster in the Department of History who read and commented on various chapters: Alix Green, Matthew Grant, Nadine Rossol, and Felix Schnell. I want to thank Sean Kelley, Tracey Loughran, and Alison Rowlans for their good advice, especially on the publishing process. I have also had excellent comments and constructive criticism from several anonymous readers. Needless to say, all errors and omissions are mine alone.

Stephen Wesley at Columbia expressed his enthusiasm for this project from our first correspondence and he has maintained it throughout the publishing process. He has also offered excellent advice and been very patient. Thanks, Stephen.

My good friends Andrew Johnstone and Carl Watts deserve a special mention. We get to see each other too rarely these days, but we always have a great time when we do and enjoy keeping up with each other’s work. I also want to thank people I now see even more rarely: my mentors from various stages of my career: Nick Cull at the University of Southern California, Scott Lucas at the University of Birmingham, and Martin Alexander, emeritus professor at Aberystwyth. Each has encouraged me and shaped my work in different ways.

My extended family remains a happy reminder that there is more to life than the American Empire. As I write these words, I, like so many others, am separated from them. I would like to be able to give copies of this book to them in person, but, even if I can’t, I hope that this is a reminder of how much they all mean to me. In Canada, Barb Rosser and Chuck Daigle have welcomed me into their home and their lives. In the UK, the Priest-Poulton clan goes from strength to strength. They may not realize the extent to which they have helped me in doing my work, but they have. Much love to my parents, Mike and Shirley, and to Suzy, Jon, Gary, Isabela, Milly, Freya, and Amalia.

Finally, my partner, Megan, has endured the slow progress of this book during our time together with great fortitude. She has also read and commented on various parts of it, and been a constant source of strength, support, and encouragement. This book is for her with all my love and thanks for everything she has done.

Parts of chapter 3 and brief sections of chapter 1 of this book appeared in “Thinking About Empire: The Administration of Ulysses S. Grant, Spanish Colonialism, and the Ten Years’ War in Cuba,” Journal of American
