Direct support for the research described in this book came from the Foundation for Child Development (FCD), supplemented by the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development and the Institute of Education Sciences. For many years, FCD has played a major role in pushing the issue of early childhood education for Latina/o children, especially those from immigrant families, into the spotlight. Its support has had immeasurable impact on my own work, and I could not be more appreciative. In particular, I owe a debt of gratitude to the former FCD president Ruby Takanishi, who has guided me in so many ways.

I also received a great deal of direct support from the research and evaluation office of the pseudonymous Southwest Independent School District, the principals and vice principals of the nine SWISD schools that participated in this research, the nearly five dozen SWISD teachers who let us into their classrooms and talked with us at length, and the more than two dozen SWISD parents who took time out of their hectic schedules of raising young children to sit down with us to discuss their children’s schools. SWISD is a good school district with much to admire, and I am glad that it is doing what it does.

At the University of Texas, I received incredible support from the staff of the Population Research Center, particularly Mary De La Garza, Sylvia Celedon, and Meghan Thomson; the Department of Sociology, especially Julie Kniseley; and the College of Liberal Arts, especially Erica Whittington, as I tried to keep an extensive research program afloat while taking on new responsibilities. There are also my many colleagues at the PRC and in the Department of Sociology and College of Liberal Arts who have a hand in almost anything I do.

For this project I owe a pronounced level of gratitude to my students who participated in the SWISD research with gusto, among them Jessica Dunning-Lozano, Anna Thornton, Claude Bonazzo, and Aida Ramos, as well as Dani Rosales. Claude and Aida went beyond carrying a heavy load in data collection. They also helped me on some of the early writings from the project that made their way into this book in various forms. That is why they more than deserve to have their names associated with this book along-side mine.

Lastly, I always have to thank my kids, Joseph and Caroline, whose early childhood education experiences helped get me into this topic, and their mother, Shannon, for being next to me on that ride.
The Starting Line
