

Acknowledgments

I thank the many people responsible for the book's completion, particularly Bruce Cumings, without whose advice, encouragement, and example this project could never even have been imagined, much less carried out. Other scholars at the University of Chicago also did a great deal to inspire and guide me, especially Harry Harootunian, Prasenjit Duara, Tetsuo Najita, and Michael Geyer. They, along with my fellow students Henry Em, Namhee Lee, Suk-jun Han, and many others, made Chicago an exciting and challenging place for the study of modern history in general and modern East Asia in particular.

Friends and fellow scholars in Japan, China, the Republic of Korea, and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea have been gracious and helpful during my visits to their countries. At Korea University in Seoul, where I spent the 1991–92 academic year as a Fulbright researcher, Choi Jang Jip was an inspiring mentor, Kang Man'gil a towering source of information, and Pak Myōngnim an invaluable guide. Over the last ten years I have been privileged to observe a new generation of bright, brave, and diligent South Korean scholars changing the face of contemporary Korean history. I am indebted to Ryu Kilchae, Yi Chongsök, Kim Sōngbo, Kim Chaeyong, and Paik Hak Soon for advice and help, and for their fine scholarship from which I have learned so much.

At the National Archives, the indefatigable Pang Sun-ju showed me around the North Korean captured document collection on each of my visits. Professor Pang knows this archive better than anyone else. Rich Boylen and other archivists in Suitland and College Park patiently assisted me in my search for relevant documentary sources.

James Palais of the University of Washington, where I spent a year as a lecturer in the Jackson School of International Studies, read the manuscript and offered many valuable suggestions for improvement. Professor Dae-Sook Suh of the University of Hawaii also gave many useful and erudite comments. A year as a visiting assistant professor at Princeton University in 1995–96 offered me the good fortune of working with and getting much useful feedback from Stephen Kotkin, Gilbert Rozman, David Wolff, David Howell, and other scholars of modern Northeast Asia. At Columbia University, where I have taught since 1996, I have found my work greatly stimulated and enriched by my colleagues in the history department and in the East Asian Institute, especially Carol Gluck, Gari Ledyard, Anders Stephanson, Madeleine Zelin, and Samuel Kim. Under the auspices of Columbia's Center for Korean Research, Alexandre Mansourov, then a graduate student at Columbia, worked assiduously to obtain and translate many useful Soviet documents relating to the Korean War. Madge Huntington of the East Asian Institute's publications department did much to help improve the manuscript for publication in the Institute's series, and Roger Haydon of Cornell University Press has been a superbly helpful and insightfully critical editor. I also thank Wada Haruki, Lim Chul, Carter Eckert, Michael Robinson, and other Korea scholars for their advice and criticism at various stages in this project.

Funding for my research was provided by numerous grants and fellowships along the way, including a Foreign Language and Area Studies grant at the University of Chicago, a University of Chicago East Asia Center grant, a Fulbright student research grant, a MacArthur Research and Training Grant, two travel grants from the Northeast Asia Council of the Association for Asian Studies, and two junior faculty development grants from Columbia University's Humanities and Social Sciences Council. The Center for Korean Research at Columbia University financed a visit to the DPRK in 1997 that, although not directly research-related, did a great deal to enhance my understanding of contemporary North Korea. I thank Stephen Linton of the Eugene Bell Foundation for organizing that trip and for the rich insights into North Korean life that he has shared with me on numerous occasions.

Final revisions on the manuscript were made during my visit to Seoul on a Fulbright Senior Scholar grant in 2000. I thank Young-ick Lew, director of the Institute for Modern Korean Studies at Yonsei University, for offering me a home base and many valuable resources and contacts during my second Fulbright stay. I also thank Dr. Horace H. Underwood, executive director of Fulbright in Korea, for his flexibility and generosity during this period of research, and Pang Ki-chung of Yonsei University and the students in his contemporary Korean history seminar for many enriching hours of discussion on recent Korean historiography. An earlier version of chapter 6 was published in Positions: East Asia Cultures Critique 3, no. 3 (winter 1996). I thank the editors of Positions for their kind permission to reproduce it here.

My parents, David and Lea Armstrong, and my entire extended family have shown great patience and understanding during the seemingly interminable process of research, writing, and publication of this book. My work has been greatly inspired by my older daughter, Mira, who has grown up with this book, and her younger sister, Sara, who was born shortly before its completion. Finally, my most important thanks are for Elia, who has been with me throughout the years it took to complete this book and encouraged my work while helping me to put it into proper perspective.
