ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

It is one of the pleasures of book writing to be able, in this public way, to thank those who have helped make the process both possible and meaningful. I feel fortunate to belong to an intellectual community that stretches between Hobart and William Smith Colleges, in Geneva, New York, where I teach, and New York City, where I live when I am not teaching. I am particularly grateful to members of reading groups in each place. In Geneva, the Not Piss Poor Academy has been meeting for several years now to discuss works in progress. Thanks to Betty Bayer, Claudette Columbus, Jodi Dean, Manisha Desai, Maureen Flynn, Susan Henking, A'Lelia Henry, and Christina Sharpe for reading two chapters at early stages and nudging me toward more incisive prose and ways to develop my thinking. My New York reading group has been a mainstay of my thinking since 1991. Thanks to the “original” members, Kate Mehuron, Margaret Walker, Mary Katherine Wainwright, and Patricia Mann, and to the newer members, Donald Mengay, Elayne Rapping, and Frances Bartkowski.

Hobart and William Smith Colleges has been a terrific place to work while writing this book. Two research grants helped enormously, one making it possible for me to travel to Patmos and the other to Washington, D.C. The interest and impressive intelligence of a number of students from various classes at Hobart and William Smith have allowed me to think out loud and get feedback on many of the topics in this book; for this I am especially grateful to Marin Lorenson, Alison Sherrick, Megan Myers-Hayes, Samantha Marrin, Amber Hoover, and Jody Gould. I would like to thank student assistants Laurel Allen, Juliet Evans, Michelle Loheac, and Rene de Gironemo who have gathered information over the years.

The innovative curriculum of the colleges has supported my scholarly efforts as well. I have been able to concentrate on issues of apocalypse and millennium by offering first-year and senior seminars with those titles. The interdisciplinary emphasis of the curriculum enabled me to plan and co-teach a course with my colleague Jodi Dean from the Political Science Department. Our bidisciplinary course, “Technologies of Truth: Aliens and Cyborgs,” has been one of the high points of my teaching career. Jodi has been especially important to this book in several ways. She read and commented on almost every chapter, some of them twice. I am also indebted to her for an invitation to write an essay that eventually became the final chapter of the book. She will understand the inside joke when I say that as a teacher and friend she has been a “real McCoy.”

Because my preoccupation with issues of apocalypse has lasted throughout the 1990s, I have engaged many friends and colleagues in what I like to think of as a sustained conversation on the Millennium. Tom Hayes has been vital to my thinking. Colleagues at the University of Athens who have remained friends long past my Fulbright stay have illuminated this and many other topics; my special thanks to Bessie Dendrinou, Eleni Haviara-Kehaidou, and John Chioles. Adrienne Leban added to my collection of Promise Keepers materials and offered important suggestions on an earlier draft. Wendy Fairey provided excellent company and a wicked wit. Anna Marie Smith listened to me agonize over titles for months and then solved the problem by deftly summing up my focus as millennial seduction.

Having the opportunity to give some of the early drafts of these chapters as presentations has proved invaluable. I am grateful to Vincent Colapietro and John Stuhr at Penn State University for including me in their philosophy conference on Foucault; to Nancy K. Miller and Louis Menand for inviting me to the Twentieth Century Seminar at the CUNY Graduate Center; to Robert Jay Lifton, Michael Flynn, and Charles Strozier at the John Jay Center on Violence and Survival; to John McGowan for organizing an MLA panel on “Theoretical Controversy”; and to Tom Tobin, Josh Slifkin, and Jean Schulte at Duquesne University for their wonderful Graduate Student Conference on “Order and Disorder.” Thanks to Malini Johar Schueller and Tina Pippin for providing the opportunity to write essays that have been revised for this book. A special thanks goes to Richard Landes, Director of the Center for Millennial Studies at Boston University, for his energy in establishing archives and organizing conferences on the history and current expression of apocalypticism.

Alison Shonkwiler has been a superb editor from start to finish. I am indebted to Stephen O’Leary for his constructive reading of the manuscript, particularly his suggestion for reorganization, and to Charles Strozier for his support and recommendations for improvement.

I also want to thank my sons and daughters-in-law, Michael and Elana Dougatz Miller and Paul Miller and Terry Freeman, for their support of my work. They make it worth doing.

Finally and most of all, I am happy to dedicate this book to my parents. Miriam and Thomas Quinby are remarkable in many ways. After nearly sixty years of marriage, during which they raised six children and bravely confronted almost every possible family crisis that can occur, they remain the most affectionate couple I know. They are both sharply intelligent and uncommonly considerate of others. Until writing this book, I had never thought of them as skeptics, in part because their spiritual lives are so different from mine. But I have had to rethink a lot of things in the process of writing this book and have come to appreciate their everyday generosity and rare ability to confront myriad difficulties with exceptional grace. In this regard, I would say that they are skeptics, Southern style.
