Many of the ideas in this book have been presented over the last few years at annual meetings of the American Political Science Association, the Midwest Political Science Association, the Northeastern Political Science Association, the American Philosophical Association (Eastern and Pacific Divisions), the North American Nietzsche Society, and the Canadian Political Science Association. I thank all of my respondents, especially Maudemarie Clark, Christoph Cox, and Leon Craig. My gratitude also extends to the fine scholars who commented on or challenged the arguments made in various parts of this book: Peter Berkowitz, Monique Deveaux, Jeremy Goldman, David Kahane, Brian Leiter, Pratap Mehta, Louis Miller, David Owen, Mark T. Reinhardt, Alan Ryan, James Tully, Brian Walker, and Bernard Yack. While I have not learned as much from them as I should have, their advice has made this a better book.

I also acknowledge the inspiration (both professional and personal) received during my postgraduate years from Charles Taylor. His strong encouragement of this project came at an especially crucial juncture. A special word of appreciation is due to my friend, colleague, and sometime collaborator Ruth Abbey, who has been uncommonly generous with her time and comments and who graciously allowed me to include a revised version of our joint essay as Chapter 6. The reader will note the pervasive influence of her important work on Nietzsche in what follows.

I acknowledge the financial assistance of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada during the years in which this book was first conceived and researched. Because of a postdoctoral fellowship awarded by the Quebec government's Fonds pour les chercheurs et l'aide à la recherche, I had the privilege of revising the manuscript in the congenial and stimulating atmosphere of Harvard University. I am grateful to Kenneth A. Shepsle, chair of the Department of Government, and Charles S. Maier, director of the Minda de Gunzburg Center for European Studies, for their kind hospitality.

Without the strong support of Roger M. Haydon at Cornell University Press, this book might never have been published. As a young author I could not have wished for a more patient, thoughtful, engaged—and engaging—editor. I am also grateful to Priscilla Hurdle, managing editor, Nancy J. Winemiller, manuscript editor, and to Liz Holmes and John LeRoy for their fine copyediting.

Finally, a word of heartfelt thanks to my immediate family. More than anyone else, my wife, Marilyn Besner, made this book possible with her magnanimous understanding, love, and support. The birth of our older daughter, Lottie, coincided with the start of this project, and Martine joined our complement as it entered its final phase. I have no doubt that the great joy they have all brought to my life has touched this book—indeed, all of my endeavors—in ways I can scarcely imagine.

Portions of Chapter 1 have appeared in my articles “The Objective Viewpoint: A Nietzschean Account,” History of Philosophy Quar- terly 13, 4 (October 1996): 483–502, and “Nietzsche’s Natural Hierarchy,” International Studies in Philosophy 29, 3 (1997): 49–62. Chapter 4 contains material published in “The Übermensch’s Consort: Nietzsche and the ‘Eternal Feminine,’” History of Political Thought 18, 3 (1997), 512–530, copyright © Imprint Academic, Exeter, U.K. Much of Chapter 6 appeared in a slightly different form as “Nietzsche’s Will to Politics,” an article coauthored with Ruth Abbey in the Review of Politics, 60, 1 (Winter 1998): 83–114. I thank the publishers of these journals for giving me permission to reproduce this work here.
