ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

If it takes a village to raise a child, the same is almost certainly true for a book manuscript—only in this case, that “village” stretches across the globe. The idea at the heart of this book was born at a small workshop held in Cape Town, South Africa, hosted by Dan Philpott from the Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies and Fanie Du Toit from the Institute for Justice and Reconciliation, in 2013. There, I heard Pumla Gobodo-Madikizela talk about her work on the “provocation of empathy.” I had the kind of moment every scholar dreams of having when I later woke up in the middle of the night and got out of bed to make long notes about what ultimately became this project.

As the project has taken shape, I have been particularly grateful for the feedback of friends and colleagues including Harvey Weinstein, Chandra Lekha Sriram, Gearoid Millar, and Eric Wiebelhaus-Brahm (Eric, especially, for reading chunks of the work both serendipitously and on purpose!)—all of whom engaged with my ideas both early on and again in the later stages of the project. Other friends and colleagues have read the manuscript in whole and in part and offered helpful feedback along the way. Among these are Bill Danaher, Jim Freedman, and Andrés Pérez-Baltodano, as well as Rhoda Howard-Hassmann, who had no idea when she signed on as my doctoral supervisor all those years ago that she would still be “on call” today. The “Empathy” Working Group of the College of the Royal Society of Canada has been invaluable, and I am grateful in particular to Reem Bahdi and Cynthia Milton for their encouragement and to Tony Calcagno for his unflagging support of this work and of me. I will forever owe an enormous debt to Mark Kersten, whose work both whipped the manuscript into shape and gave me the boost I needed to cross the finish line. Thank you all.

I have been assisted in this work by a number of wonderful undergraduate and graduate students. I owe thanks, in particular, to two. The first is Catherine Dunne, whose engagement with the concept of thin sympathy helped to give it form in its earliest incarnation. And the second is Tammy Lambert, whose valuable help in the field and afterward had an important impact on this project; her feedback and scholarly rigor have contributed to my own intellectual growth. I am grateful to you both.

I continue to be humbled by my many Ugandan friends and colleagues who have quietly and not so quietly afforded me the opportunity to learn from them and to ask so many questions. I am inspired daily by these unsung heroes who carry out the difficult work of human rights and transitional justice in a place where these spaces have become increasingly small, and at an alarming risk to themselves. To each of you, thank you from the bottom of my heart.

I am particularly grateful to the team at the University of Pennsylvania Press for their support. In particular, I would like to thank Bert Lockwood for working his magic, and both Damon Linker and Lily Simmons for their amazingly quick work and their professionalism.

Funding for elements of this project came from a number of different sources. I wish to acknowledge the importance of funding received from the Royal Society College Member Projects Fund; from the University of Western Ontario through the FRDF Agnes Cole Dark Fund, Faculty of Social Science Small Grant Research Competition, the SSHRB Bridge Grant, and the Smallman Fund; and from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council in the form of both an Exchange Grant and an Insight Grant.

My friends and family outside the university are perhaps the longest-suffering and most in need of thanks. To all of you for your forbearance when I was AWOL for whole chunks of time, when I ratted on at dinner parties, and when I stayed in to work instead of going out, thank you. To my parents and to the Hubbard Five, thank you for your unwavering support and encouragement. And to my husband, Joe, as always, thank you.
