Acknowledgments

Breaking through the Noise is the culmination of a lengthy collaboration that we began in 2002. Although we have written several conference papers and published a few articles on the presidency and media, we had avoided tackling the more difficult questions surrounding presidential leadership and responsiveness in regards to the public. Once we refined our ambitions to presidential agenda-setting and realized that we needed more than a couple of articles to make our mark, we turned our ideas into this book. We have arrived at the end of this project, not without a few bumps in the road, but as better scholars for having taken the journey.

Along the way, we have had help from many scholars and graduate students. George Edwards’s research and guidance has been instrumental not only in this book but also in our general approach to studying the presidency. Jeff Cohen commented on our initial idea and was instrumental in helping us focus our research question. Dan Wood’s methodological approach to study the dynamics of the American presidency has clearly inspired this book. It is the ideas of these three giants in the subfield of presidential politics that drove much of this book’s research.

Others deserve thanks for helping, in both large and small ways, our ideas become this book. Matt’s colleagues at the University of North Texas were both patient and supportive. To name a few, Paul Collins answered myriad questions about methods, case selection, and theoretical framing, Tetsuya Matsubayashi helped explore other possible causal modeling strategies, Mathieu Turgeon commented on our conception of public opinion processing, and Jim Meernik, when department chair, fostered an environment conducive to writing a book. Thanks also to the Office of Research and Economic Development at the University of North Texas for a small grant that we used to help defray the cost of indexing the book. Jeff’s colleagues at Bowling Green were great sounding boards for ideas. Especially helpful were David Jackson, Neal Jesse, and Melissa Miller. We thank Ryan Salzman, Jun-deh Wu, Chris Linebarger, and Tom Miles, at UNT, and Kate Bresnan, Cody Koch, and Yuanliang Wang, at Bowling Green, for help with research assistance. Conversations with Johanna Dunaway about media and with Brandon Rottinghaus about the presidency and public opinion were most helpful. Discussions with Martha Kumar were especially encouraging and helpful in shaping our ideas on public relations in the White House. John Geer provided supportive comments on an earlier version of the paper that encouraged us to pursue a book-length project. Others have offered comments, through informal conversations or as panel discussants, over the long course of this project. They include Steve Forde, Andrew Enterline, Lori Cox Han, Diane Heith, Karen Hoffman, Chuck Walcott, Jim Pfiffner, Paul Quirk, and Eric Juenke. Thanks are also due to Justin Vaughn, Ken Meier, and seminar participants at Texas A&M University, where Matt presented an earlier version of Chapter 5. Several suggestions by two anonymous reviewers were vital to improving the presentation of the book and addressing limitations to our findings and conclusions according to the policies we examine. Thanks go as well to John Woolley and Gerhard Peters for the American Presidency Project, an indispensible resource for public presidency research.

Everyone at Stanford University Press has been helpful. Series editor Shirley Anne Warshaw provided encouragement and important suggestions at the initial stages of the project. Stacy Wagner saw enough promise in our proposal to send it out for review. She has offered valuable suggestions reflected in a much improved final manuscript. We appreciate that Jessica Walsh kept us apprised of our manuscript status during review and assisted us with completing the publication paperwork. Emily Smith and the production team at the Press were outstanding to work with. Finally, Margaret Pinette’s help was instrumental in putting the final touches on the book.

Our deepest and most sincere thanks go to our families. Although Ethan and Rowan’s control of the Force has surely helped push this book to fruition, and Shelly provides essential inspiration, Matt dedicates this book to his parents, Joe and Susan Soha, for teaching him the importance of education and giving him the freedom to pursue his own path. Jacob and Nathan forced Jeff to devote at least some of his free time to play, rather than work, and Lori’s patience, strength, and love provided him much needed encouragement.
BREAKING THROUGH THE NOISE