Acknowledgments

If publishing a book is similar to bearing a child, then mine was a long and protracted pregnancy with many unexpected turns and distractions, but a swift and easy delivery. This book started as my dissertation project more than eight years ago, but it has changed in ways I could not have foreseen.

Numerous colleagues in the social sciences read and commented on separate chapters, engaged me intellectually in discussions of the ideas I presented at conferences, and gave me advice along the way, among them Patrik Aspers, Bruce Carruthers, Barry Cohen, Stephen Kalberg, Mark Mizruchi, Dan Monti, Marc Schneiberg, Andrew Spicer, as well as other junior professors at Boston University: Emily Barman, Julian Go, and Laurel Smith-Doerr (who have already published their first books, thus strongly motivating me to finish mine). BU Sociology Chair John Stone should be credited for suggesting the title and Juliet Johnson for the advice to shorten it. Juliet and Gerry McDermott read the entire manuscript, and their comments and advice helped me strengthen my arguments. Valery Yakubovich was the sounding board for many of my ideas, reading and commenting on several of the chapters’ drafts and generously sharing his expertise and passion for research in the economic sociology field. Russian economic sociologist Olga Kuzina, whom I met during my first field trip to Moscow, has become my collaborator and a close friend. From her I learned a great deal about the Russian transitional economy and Russian economic sociology. She conducted several of the interviews for this project. Finally, I am indebted to Ákos Róna-Tás, who has been my teacher and mentor, and then coauthor and friend for more than ten years. He witnessed this project germinate from a tiny seed of an idea into a large-scale, multicountry collaborative effort, on which we now work together.
Earlier versions of the chapters were presented at meetings of the American Sociological Association, Society for the Advancement of Socio-Economics and International Institute of Sociology, MIT–Harvard Economic Sociology Colloquium, Russian Studies Workshop at the University of Chicago, and to audiences at Boston University, University of California, Irvine, University of California, San Diego, University of Wisconsin–Madison, International University Bremen (Germany), and Oxford University.

I am thankful to all my Russian interviewees, many of whom are pioneers and die-hard enthusiasts of the Russian credit card market, in particular, Pavel Stromsky, Vladimir Shavanichev, and Pavel Ivanov, as well as Valery Torkhov and Valery Shipilov, who generously shared their time and insights with me, invited me to give talks, and put their networks at my disposal.

This project would have not been possible had I not had an opportunity to come to the United States to study at the University of California, San Diego. I owe it to Dr. Gerald Kent and his wife, Barbara, who sponsored me and made it happen. Jerry should also be credited with the topic of this book, which emerged from our regular lunch conversations while I was a student at UC San Diego.

I would also like to thank my editor at Stanford University Press, Margo Beth Crouppen. I have always found it peculiar when writers rave about their editors in acknowledgment sections using words like “incredible,” “encouraging,” and “caring.” Margo has been all this and more. It is to her and a team of professionals at Stanford University Press, most notably my production editor Mariana Raykov, that I owe that swift and easy delivery. They have given me the support that every writer ought to have, making the potentially scary and difficult process easy and enjoyable.

My family deserves special words of thanks. My mother did not live to see this day, but she was always my biggest fan, encouraging me to do great things. I inherited the love of books and learning from my father, an avid book collector whose home library numbers over five thousand volumes. I hope he will find a place for my book on one of his shelves. My husband’s daily question, “Have you submitted your manuscript yet?” kept me on track when I wanted to slack off. He read it from cover to cover, helped me with the figures, and did not scoff at my last-minute requests to change them in the wee hours of the morning. In retrospect, I am amazed he was able to put up with my obsessive writing for so long. My daughter, Dasha, was patiently crafting her own books (with illustrations!) while I was writing mine. I think it was her way of showing me that it was indeed possible. My son Artyom’s impending birth put me on a tight deadline, pushing me to complete the manuscript only a few weeks before he came into the world.

I dedicate this book to my children, with gratitude for the inspiration they have given me and with the hope that one day they will publish theirs.

This project is based, in part, on work supported by the National Science Foundation (NSF) under Grant No 242076. Any opinions, findings, and conclusions or recommendations expressed in this material are those of the author and do not necessarily reflect the views of the NSF. Parts of Chapters 1 and 5 were previously published as “Building New Markets: A Comparison between Russian and American Credit Card Markets” in the Socio-Economic Review 2005, 3:437–66. Parts of Chapter 1 were also published with Ákos Róna-Tas as “Uncertainty, Risk and Trust: Russian and American Credit Card Markets Compared” in American Sociological Review 2001, 66(5):623–46. American Sociological Association and Oxford University Press kindly allowed me to use these materials. Parts of Chapter 3 were previously published as “Friends and Foes: Informal Networks in the Soviet Union” in East European Quarterly 2007, 41(3):323–47.
