ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

It is a pleasure to thank the people who inspired and assisted me in the writing of this book. While I began my intellectual and personal journey in the summer of 2005 into a world of Jewish, American, and world destinies that might have been—much more on that emotionally stirring experience in the Prologue—many of my early cogitations and considerations were crystallized during a sojourn at the bucolic College of Charleston in the spring of 2013. I am especially grateful to Professor Ted Rosengarten, the school's expert on Holocaust studies, who carefully read an early draft of my work in progress. I benefitted greatly from his wise critique, counsel, and friendship. Returning to New York and to my home institution, Yeshiva University, I was, as always, encouraged to continue my work by my “rabbi,” our provost Dr. Morton Lowengrub. At Yeshiva's library, John J. Moryl and Mary Ann Linahan were of inestimable help. Among my network of friends in the academy, Professors Marc Lee Raphael of the College of William and Mary and Benjamin R. Gampel of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America stand out for their willingness to take time from their own scholarly labors to serve as sounding boards for my ideas. I am also especially thankful that Professor Gavriel Rosenfeld of Fairfield University, who has done more than any other scholar to bring alternate history into the academy, reviewed and commented on a section of the book (a portion of which will appear in his forthcoming volume of counterfactual essays). I am also grateful to Marlie Wasserman, the director of Rutgers University Press, for her sustained interest in my “novel” approach to history. Thanks are also due to the anonymous outside readers who made important contributions to the quality of my work.

As with all my creative endeavors, I am heartened and energized by the loving support from my ever-growing family. I look forward to dinnertime debates over the book with Eli, Sheri, Dan, Rosie, and Michael. I hope that Audrey and Mira will join the conversation. For now, Zev, Margot, Hannah, Dahlia, and Sophie will have to content themselves with seeing their names in print. Finally, Pamela, the bedrock of the Gurocks, shares with me the joy of another completed project.
