"A WORLD without debts! The stars will be thrown off course. Everything will be in disarray," says Panurge in Rabelais's Gargantua and Pantagruel. The academic world is certainly indebted to debt, and I have more IOUs to friends, students, and colleagues than I can possibly repay. By inviting me to participate in a conference on debt at the Dickens Project, Regenia Gagnier got me started (others at that conference to whom I am grateful in various ways include Murray Baumgarten, Diane Elam, Lydia Fillingham, Catherine Gallagher, and John Jordan). I am grateful also to David Simpson, Margaret Ferguson, and their colleagues at the University of Colorado for comments on another early version of this book. In 1992, I had the good fortune to be a faculty presenter at a National Endowment for the Humanities Summer Institute at the Yale Center for British Art, where again I offered early pieces of this book (thanks to Linda Peterson, Duncan Robinson, and others at that institute, including Harriet Adams, Martin Danahay, Philip Smith, and Anthony Wohl).

Among my colleagues at Indiana, I owe a lot to Jim Naremore and Bob Arno for many conversations and ideas, especially when we team-taught together. Both Jim and I participated in the Multidisciplinary Faculty Seminar on Cultural Studies sponsored by our Dean of Faculties Office (for which I thank our former dean, Anya Royce, and also the other participants: Chris Anderson, Richard Bauman, Casey Blake, Donna Eder, Kathryn Flannery, Barbara Klinger, Christine Ogan, and Beverly Stoeltje). Other friends and colleagues who have helped include Jim Adams, Michelle Moody Adams, Purnima Bose, Mary and Bill Burgan, Bill Cagle, Linda Charnes, Eva Cherniavsky, John Eakin, Jonathan Elmer, Mary Favret, Don Gray, Sheila Lindenbaum, Chris and Pam Lohmann, Andrew Miller, Richard Nash, Joan Pong Linton, Tony Shippis, Johanna Smith, Janet Sorensen, Lee Sterrenburg, Steve Watt, Perry Willett, Nick Williams, Cary Wolfe, and Paul Zietlow.

As always, I have also learned much from the graduate students with whom I have had the privilege to work, including Joe Bizup, Russ

Coon, Salah El-Moncef, John Glendening, Brian Goldberg, Scott Harter, Pranav Jani, Jean Kowaleski, Bill Little, Eileen Morgan, Cynthia Patton, Tom Prasch, Suk-Koo Rhee, Rob Richardson, Elizabeth Rosdeitcher, Cannon Schmitt, John Shanahan, Gary Willingham-McLain, and Mohammed Zayani. Matthew Rowlinson provided a helpful reading, and Janet Mais, some excellent editing; thanks also, as usual, to Bernhard Kendler for being so supportive. Parts of this book appeared in earlier versions in Victorian Literature and Culture and Victorian Studies; thanks to their editors for permission to revise and reprint. And Ellen Brantlinger has been my constant partner, friend, colleague, and creditor. I am probably forgetting to thank a few dozen others . . . thus accumulating more debts.
