Acknowledgments

This book grew out of a series of informal conversations that the two editors initiated in 1993. These conversations led to a broader dialogue with the contributors to this volume and eventually to the plans for a collection on contingent work.

We would like to acknowledge many individuals for their contribution to this project. To begin, we especially thank our contributors, who thoughtfully responded to suggestions for revision and deadlines during a very long project. We also appreciate the efforts of librarian Jane Hyrshko, who deserves special thanks for her skill and good humor in providing numerous articles, chapters, books, and government documents during the early stages of the collection’s development.

The staff and reviewers employed by Cornell University Press/ILR were a tremendous asset in the development of the volume, giving us prescient insights, comments, and recommendations. We want to thank Fran Benson, Editor-in-Chief of Cornell University Press, and her staff. Through stops and starts, Fran’s unflagging support and guidance were critical in the early stages through to the final development of the volume. The efforts of Cornell’s Teresa Jesionowski and Kay Scheuer were critical to the final shaping of the project, as was John LeRoy’s astute sense of language. Others who provided help at various points included Manasi Tirodkar and Lilian Barria.

Finally, our family members lived through the best and worst moments of this project. Kathleen Barker thanks her husband, Gary Holden, for his diplomatic and almost unerringly correct solutions to problems of text and data presentation. The combination of his high tolerance for ambiguity, his affection, and his love of merriment made the development and completion of this collection an easier task. Family members Agnes and Russell deserve special thanks for believing that each corner turned on this topic represented a significant achievement. Kathleen Christensen wants to thank her husband, Jack Murray, for his thoughtful editorial suggestions and his good humor and her daughters, Clare and Grace, for their patience.

During this project, we moved a number of times and each of us experienced significant changes in job responsibilities. Through it all, our families were steadfast in their support and nurturance. We thank them and hope that their nurturance, our contributors' insights, and our perseverance result in a compelling portrait of one aspect of the transition in American employment relations at the beginning of the twenty-first century.
