ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

SOCIAL SCIENCE CASE STUDIES require lengthy periods of organization and gestation. A large number of persons in addition to the authors become involved in the process: the practitioners themselves, various observers, and, of course, colleagues and students. Thus by the time this volume was ready for publication, the list of advisers, benefactors, and facilitators had grown far too long to be enumerated here. It does not, however, diminish our gratitude for those who assisted us in this project.

We both benefited from sabbatical leaves from our respective universities during the preparation of this volume. Especially helpful to Charles Craypo were Notre Dame labor economists Teresa Ghilarducci and Ned Lorenz, whose perceptions and suggestions inspired portions of the analysis, and Frank Wilkinson, whose model of productive systems was instrumental in the conception and organization of the project. Charles Craypo is also indebted to Robert F. Harbrant, Eleanor Kennelly, Stuart Weisberg, and Harold A. Forman for identifying and making available documents and secondary sources on meatpacking.

Bruce Nissen wishes to acknowledge the assistance he received from the staff of the Calumet Project for Industrial Jobs, especially the director, Lynn Feekin.

The contributors are indebted to Erica Fox, whose editorial expertise made the final manuscript more precise, lucid, and focused than it might have been without her, and to Juli Tate, who transcribed seemingly endless changes and revisions in the manuscript. Her skill, patience, and good humor throughout the process are appreciated. Finally, we want to thank Fran Benson and Patty Peltekos, director and managing editor of ILR Press, for sharing our belief that industrial decline in the Midwest is a story worth telling and for their competence and care in seeing the project through to completion.
