I gratefully acknowledge the financial support of the Council for European Studies at Princeton University, the French Government Fellowship Program, the Social Science Research Council, and the Whiting Foundation, whose combined support enabled me to spend two years in France. More recently, Scripps College research fellowships have helped me return to France and have freed time for revisions. The American Council of Learned Societies Post-Doctoral Fellowship for the Study of Modern Society and Values supported the research for the final chapter of the book and gave me the time to put it in final form. Nancy Burson has shown remarkable patience, kindness, and competence in typing the manuscript.

Before going to Paris in 1981 I benefited from the intellectual stimulation and support of the history department at Princeton University. The freedom of intellectual inquiry which it preserves against the ever-rising tide of professional specialization is combined with a rigorous critical spirit to promote an openminded but fairly skeptical community of ideas. I am grateful for having had the opportunity to participate in it.

My work in France was made more fruitful and more enjoyable by amiable contact with French scholars. I express my debt to Raymond Aron and especially to Michel Foucault for reading drafts of this book and discussing them with me. The personal generosity and warmth of each man adds to the loss one feels in their deaths. I am most grateful to Claude Lefort for his help throughout my stay in France and for his criticisms and comments on all stages of this project. Eugène Fleischmann shared with me his detailed knowledge of Hegelian philosophy and opened new perspectives for me on philosophy and history. I am grateful to him for his encouragement and shall always value his friendship dearly.

The sections on Alexandre Kojève and Eric Weil would not be what they are without the help I received from Nina Ivanoff, the legatee of Kojève, and from Anne Weil and Catherine Mendelssohn, the wife and sister-in-law of Weil. Anne Weil gave generously of herself at the end of her life, and like so many others I keep a fond memory of her strong, sensitive spirit. The openness, intelligence, and generosity of these women have been equaled only by their kindness.

An earlier version of this book was read by Victor Gourevitch, Jerrold Seigel, and Sheldon Wolin, who gave me detailed comments on early drafts and talked with me at length and in depth about the interrelationship of politics, philosophy, and history. Professor Gourevitch first introduced me to Hegel and Kojève when I was an undergraduate at Wesleyan University, and he has responded with patience to my questions about history and philosophy ever since. At Princeton, Carl Schorske has also listened to these questions and suffered through my repeated attempts to work out answers to them. His criticism and support vastly improved my work, and his teaching remains for me a model of pedagogy.

By continuing to reveal to me some of the meanings of destiny, my wife, Laurence Roth, has contributed more than she realizes to my understanding of knowing and of history. Although these meanings are rarely very clear, they are never, I begin to see, unimportant.
