This new yearbook series, in a glossy A4 format, provides analytical reportage and background articles on Namibia, together with official statistics and edited texts culled from major speeches and reports. The first two annual volumes examined include a wide variety of articles, reports, and features (many with full-colour illustrations) on Namibia's government, the country's major industries, the economy and development prospects, etc. together with contributions on the arts, wildlife, and the environment. The publishers aim to present "a balanced and constructive view of the country, free of political partisanship", and this attractively produced yearbook on Africa's newest independent nation will be an essential serials acquisition for most African studies collections.

This somewhat oddly numbered first issue is apparently aimed to serve as a pilot number for a new bi-weekly newsletter. Published from outside Madagascar, it promises to "scan, with our native eyes, the political, social, economic, environmental and cultural events happening in Madagascar". The pilot number includes some analysis on the economy, reflections and commentary on the November 1992 presidential elections, and a mixture of news items and short reports on other topics.
