

Acknowledgements

Creating this book from the papers presented at the conference, Citizens at the Crossroads: Whose Information Society?, has been a pleasure for a number of reasons. First, the intellectual resources at a major university such as The University of Western Ontario are deployed in different departments, often bound up with their own disciplinary considerations. We were able to work together with some of the best scholars on this campus on the Conference Program Committee which played the role of referee and helped us to select an array of papers that reflected the interdisciplinary nature of the issues at hand. The Program Committee, chaired by Manjunath Pendakur, consisted of Dr. Robert Young, Department of Political Science; Drs. Anton Allahar and Kevin McQuillan, Department of Sociology; Dr. Ian Kerr, Faculties of Law & Information and Media Studies, and Drs. Grant Campbell, Carole Farber, Roma Harris, and Mr. Steven Joyce, Faculty of Information and Media Studies. The government partners were represented by Mr. Dick Stanley, Acting Director of the Strategic Research and Analysis of the Department of Canadian Heritage and Ms. Nancy Wildgoose, Director General, Policy Research of the Canadian International Development Agency. Both Dick and Nancy took an active interest in shaping the conference from the very beginning and helped us to select appropriate papers for presentation. We acknowledge the serious commitment of time and effort that all these individuals made to achieve a successful international conference.

Ms. Kristen Romme has worked tirelessly on the book project from its very inception. She has helped us in all of the detailed work of corresponding with the authors and preparing the papers in this collection for publication. Her skills of communication and organization, as well as her unflagging good humour have been invaluable in the completion of this project.

Our deepest gratitude goes to the authors who not only wrote the pieces you see here but were patient with our crazy schedules. A book of this kind is nearly impossible to produce without the generous sponsorship we have received from the Department of Canadian Heritage and the Canadian International Development Agency. Dick Stanley and Nancy Wildgoose have given us their unconditional support and complete freedom as co-editors. We have both very much appreciated that spirit.

While working on editing the manuscripts, Roma and I came to a quick understanding of what was important in telling a story that would capture the essence of the conference and the major concerns expressed by the presenting scholars. Exploring the information society critically, from a number of diverse perspectives, is the central intent of the book. We hope that it will be useful, not only to students of the information society, but to policy makers who must grapple with the real problems and opportunities it poses.
