I am grateful to the many organizations and agencies that helped to fund research for this project: the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH), the Library and Archives of the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution, and Peace of Stanford University, including its Archives Summer Workshops, the National Council for Eurasian and Eastern European Research (NCEER), the Kennan Institute of the Woodrow Wilson Center, and the Open Society Archives (OSA) at Central European University (Budapest). At Rowan University my deans, Jay Harper, Parviz Ansari, and Cindy Vitto provided me with research and travel support.

I would like to thank the following people, who generously read parts of my manuscript, conference papers, or articles in draft form, and offered valuable advice and suggestions: Yoram Gorlizki, Stephen Kotkin, David Brandenberger, Paul Gregory, Eugene Huskey, Benjamin Nathans, Peter Holquist, Jeffrey Jones, Wendy Goldman, Don K. Rowney, Alfred Rieber, Andrei Markevich, Mark Harrison, Vanessa Voisin, Leonid Borodkin, Golfo Alexopolous, Kathryn Hendley, Juliane Fürst, Robert Weinberg, Becky Griffin-Heinzen, and Bill Heinzen.

Paul Gregory invited me to wonderful workshops on Stalinism that he organized at the Hoover Archive at Stanford. The seminars were stimulating and collegial, and provided me with access to the Hoover’s amazing collections and staff, including its directors Eric Wakin and Elena Danielson, archivist Lora Soroka, and the director of the reading room, Carol Leadenham. I am grateful for the assistance of several professional Russian archivists and staff, including Galina Gorskaia, Nina I. Abdullaeva, Elena A. Tiurina, Tatiana V. Tsarevskaya, and the staff and archivists of the Russian State Archive of Socio-Political History (RGASPI) and the State Archive of the Russian Federation (GARF). My excellent research assistants at Rowan University were Melissa Ambricco Schwartz, Gregory Hopely, Edward Purcell, and Caressa Lynch.

Special thanks to Peter Solomon, who over the course of more than ten years has offered unstinting encouragement as I wrote this book. He read the entire manuscript and numerous conference papers, patiently offering advice. I am grateful, too, to David Shearer. Our marathon lunches have helped to shape the way I think about Soviet history. Dave read large chunks of the manuscript, often in very rough form, and offered valuable suggestions about every dimension of the book. To a person, my remarkable colleagues in the history department at Rowan University are wonderful people, as well as excellent scholars and teachers. Special thanks to department chairs, Bill Carrigan, Edward Wang, and Joy Wiltenburg, and to Denise Williams, the department secretary. As I was nearing completion of this project, William C. Jordan, Philip Nord, and David Abraham unexpectedly took the time to share their expertise on everyday corruption. I also want to thank Beverly Michaels, the copy editor for Yale University Press, whose careful reading of the manuscript has made the book much better.

Becky Griffin-Heinzen gave advice and read every chapter multiple times, immeasurably improving the book in every respect. To her I owe the greatest debt, in this and in all things great and small. My children, Conor Heinzen and Jay Heinzen, have provided me with enormous inspiration over the years as they have demonstrated curiosity, courage, and great humor. To them this book is dedicated.

Some parts of this book have been published previously. An expanded version of chapter 3 was published as “The Art of the Bribe: Corruption and Everyday Practice in the Late Stalinist USSR,” in Slavic Review 66, no. 3 (2007). The basis of chapter 4 appeared as “Thirty Kilos of Pork: Cultural Brokers, Corruption, and the ‘Bribe Trail’ in the Late Stalinist Soviet Union,” Journal of Social History 46, no. 4 (2013). Chapter 6 appeared in a longer form as “Informers and the State under Late Stalinism: Informant Networks and Crimes against ‘Socialist Property,’ 1940–1953,” Kritika: Explorations in Russian History 8, no. 4

Each of the people named here deserves credit for helping to write this book. All the blame for its shortcomings, needless to say, lies with me alone.
