Writing this book would have been impossible without access to the indispensable collection of the London Library, a jewel in the crown of the city’s cultural institutions. I am grateful for the assistance of the librarians and other staff there. The Centre for Hellenic Studies at King’s College, London has provided a congenial and stimulating academic home during the period. This is the first book I have set out to write without having arranged a publisher, when access to the latter seems nowadays to require a bevy of intermediaries. I was fortunate that at a vital juncture Julian Loose, Editorial Director at Yale University Press, took the book under his wing and helped shape its final form. The anonymous expert readers for the Press provided invaluable critical scrutiny. At the Press, Marika Lysandrou efficiently oversaw the publishing schedule, and the copy-editing supervised by Rachael Lonsdale brought to bear wide-ranging knowledge and scrupulous accuracy. Charlotte Chapman contributed an eagle eye to the process. Thanks go to the Library and Archive of the British School at Athens for making available the photograph of the School appearing in Chapter 5, and to Ian Collins and the John Craxton Estate for providing the lovely photograph of the artist and Margot Fonteyn in Chapter 7. The two colour plates of Cyprus were kindly made available by Dr. Rita Severis at the excellent Centre for Visual Arts and Research (CVAR) in Nicosia. Amongst many Mediterranean locations appearing in these pages, Cyprus is mentioned only sporadically, but it is that island which has been to me what Henry Miller once wrote Greece had afforded him – ‘a world of light’. My gratitude goes to friends there who have given me their generosity, warmth and love over many years. This book is dedicated to my wife, Hillia, for her constant support.
