little did I know when I began work on this project that it would occupy me for more than a decade. This book represents the outcome of that long period of researching, thinking, and writing on the topic. Completing the book has stretched and challenged me in many ways, and I have drawn on many different sources of support and inspiration during along the way. At York University, Leo Panitch and Hannes Lacher deserve special mention for their commitment, diligence, and encouragement while supervising my PhD thesis. Stephen Gill also provided important insights both at the very beginning and end of the program. Perhaps more important than the academic support I received at York, though, was the camaraderie and intellectual inspiration offered by my friends: Joseph Baines, Eric George, Julian Germann, and Sandy Hager. Their support has been indispensable.

At the University of Sheffield, Colin Hay and Tony Payne deserve a special mention for hiring a PhD student with a half-written thesis to begin work as a postdoctoral fellow at their new postcrisis research institute, SPERI (Sheffield Political Economy Research Institute). The support and opportunities provided by my time at SPERI gave me a further opportunity for me to develop this project and taught me many things, both intellectual and professional. Andrew Gamble has also been a source of inspiration and guidance, both as my external examiner for the PhD and then as a mentor back in the UK. I am very much indebted to his generosity. Scott Lavery also provided intellectual inspiration during my time at Sheffield and since, and I have benefited greatly from the work that we have undertaken together. And, at the University of Bristol, where I spent two very enjoyable years, John Downer deserves special mention for his friendship, intellectual curiosity, and support.

The final stages of this project were all completed while working in POLIS (Department of Politics and International Studies) at Cambridge. Here I have continued to receive encouragement and support, while benefiting from a hugely stimulating intellectual environment. Helen Thompson, David Runciman, Jason Sharman, and Duncan Kelly deserve particular mention for their contributions in helping me complete this book. At Princeton University Press, Sarah Caro offered encouragement early on, and Hannah Paul has since proved an excellent editor. On a more personal note, my family have been supportive of my academic journey from the start, and I am very much indebted to their love and warmth. Finally, to my partner, Solène: sharing the completion of this book with you is a cherished privilege.
